After Tom Herr fouled off two bunt attempts and fouled out, Coleman and Smith executed a double steal with Dan Driessen at the plate. Twins catcher Tim Lardner, who threw out just 19 percent of opposing base stealers this year, dropped the pitch and did not make a throw. Coleman, successful on 22 of 27 steal attempts at third base this year, later in the game got his sixth steal of the Series, one short of the Series record set by St. Louis' Lou Brock in 1967 and 1968.

Driessen was intentionally walked and Willie McGee was called out on strikes on three pitches before Ford, 2-for-2 with a walk against Blyleven in Game 2, lined a sharp single to center. Jose Oquendo then hit a chopper that shortstop Greg Gagne charged in a hurry and misplayed for an error that allowed Driessen to score.

The Cardinals made it 4-0 in the seventh when Coleman drew a one-out walk from Keith Atherton, was balked him to second, stole third. Jeff Reardon relieved and Coleman scored on Smith's single off second baseman Steve Lombardozzi's glove. Smith followed with his second steal, giving the Cardinals four in the game and an 8-3 edge in the Series.

The Twins scored their two runs in the eighth as Gladden and Gagne led off with singles and Cox got Kirby Puckett on a flyball to center. Ken Dayley came on and got Hrbek on a flyball to center and was replaced by Todd Worrell.

Gary Gaetti hit a flyball to deep center field that Willie McGee had for a split second as he crashed into the wall. Gaetti was credited with a triple and Tom Brunansky ended the inning by flying out center.

The save was the second in the Series for Worrell, who walked two in the ninth but got pinch-hitter Don Baylor on a popup to end the game.

A cheering crowd of 55,347 saw the Cardinals become the 51st team to hold a 3-2 lead in the World Series. Of the first 50, 34 have gone on to win.

The Twins' franchise, meanwhile, lost its 11th straight World Series game on the road. The last victory came in 1925 when the team was the Washington Senators and they beat Pittsburgh behind Walter Johnson.

The Cardinals' five stolen bases matched the Series record for a nine-inning game last set by the Chicago Cubs in 1907.

A pair of hit-and-run singles by Tony Pena, who had three hits, set up scoring chances in the third and fifth innings, and the Cardinals ran themselves out of both of them.

Oquendo led off the third with a single to become St. Louis' first runner, and he took third when Pena grounded a single to right field.

Cox sacrificed Pena to second and Coleman followed with a grounder to shortstop Gagne, who was playing back. But Oquendo broke back toward third when the ball was hit, got a late jump and was easily out on Gagne's throw to catcher Tim Lardner. Blyleven got Smith on a grounder to end the inning.

In the fifth, Oquendo singled with one out and Pena singled him to third.

Sports Briefly

Crew team finishes season

K-State's crews will wind up fall practices Saturday on Tuttle Creek Reservoir with their annual class day intrasquad regatta.

Warren Rose, 1972 K-State crew captain, will be featured as guest speaker at a 6:30 p.m. dinner in the K-State Union Ballroom, following the regatta.

Tentatively, the crews will row north to south along the east side of Tuttle, finishing just north of the parking lot on the east side of the lake.

At 1:30 p.m., the women's novice eight will take on the Manhattan High School women's varsity eight. At 2:00, the women's varsity fours will compete, followed by a 2:30 p.m. contest between the men's freshman eights. To cap-off the competition, the men's senior class will compete against a sophomore-junior combination squad and an alumni eight.

At the dinner, the regatta winners will receive awards and several other team awards will be distributed.

The boat grounds will be opened Saturday morning for visitors and competitors to picnic.

NFL odds may look peculiar

To know what the strike did to form in the NFL, the answer is a simple question: When was the last time an 0-5 team was a 10-point favorite?

That's what the New York Giants are against the St. Louis Cardinals this Sunday as the NFL gets back to a semblance of normality. When you think about it, that is normality — why shouldn't the Giants at home be favored by 10 over the Cards?

That's typical of the unknown factors in the first real games in four weeks.

In other words, picking winners after the strike may be just as hard as during it.

KSU Stadium to rock Saturday

School marching bands to show their stuff

By Jennifer Dorsch
Staff Writer

Although there isn't a K-State football game in town Saturday, fans who enjoy the half-time festivities can still go to KSU Stadium to watch marching bands perform.

The Central States Marching Festival will feature seven competing high school bands and the K-State Marching Band.

This is the first year for a marching contest at K-State, said Stan Finck, director of bands and assistant professor of music.

"Several area directors requested we have a festival because of the amount of money it takes them to go to contests in Wichita and District I (a contest hosted by Shawnee Mission schools)," he said.

"One of the callings of the University is to serve its constituents," Finck said. "The festival is a service to area band directors."

The festival will start at 2 p.m. with the K-State percussion line performing the feature show it will present at the Percussive Arts Society International Convention in St. Louis Oct. 30.

Following the K-State percussion line, high schools from Emporia, Kansas City Harmon, Salina South, Marysville, Manhattan, Shawnee Mission North and Derby will perform.

"It's an obvious recruitment item for our band and K-State, and we're getting really quality bands so there should be an excellent response," Finck said.

Each band will perform a show eight to 12 minutes in length for a panel of judges. The bands will be given a rating of I, II or III, according to Kansas State High School Activities Association guidelines, Finck said.

In addition to the rating, the judges will give taped comments about the performances. There will be special judges for the colorguard and percussion units.

A unique feature of the Central States Festival is immediately following a band's performance, one of two percussion judges will conduct a clinic with the percussion section to critique and to explain his comments, Finck said. Other contests in Kansas don't have the extra judges, and the percussion clinic is a way for the group to get immediate response, he said.

Bruce Major, assistant instructor of music, and Dino Riccio, percussion arranger from Orlando, Fla., will critique the drum lines. David Dagenais, former K-State colorguard coordinator and band director at Nemaha Valley High School, will judge the auxiliary units.

Following the last group's performance, directors will have a chance to talk to the judges in an open critique session. The judges, A.J. Hoefler, Oconomowoc, Wis.; Rick Kirby, New Berlin, Wis.; and Robert Franzblau, Oconomowoc, Wis., are all members of the Central States Judging Association. Kirby has done several musical arrangements for the K-State marching band, Finck said.

"The timing for this year's festival is super," he said. "It is late enough that the bands have their shows ready but not so late that they are tired of it."

"(The festival) gives us a goal to work toward polishing a real 'competition' show and perform it in front of a band-oriented audience in a big stadium," said Rod Manges, Manhattan High School band director.

"As the date draws nearer, the kids are getting more excited. The last few rehearsals should get better," Manges said.

Admission for the festival is $2 for adults and $1 for high school students and younger and K-State students with a validated student ID. The gates open at 1 p.m., and parking in the west stadium lot will be free.

Leaders resolve dispute over missiles

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze "basically resolved" a dispute over West German nuclear missiles Thursday in talks both sides described as productive.

The two, holding their third round of negotiations this year, were trying to settle the last sticking points in a treaty to scrap intermediate-range nuclear missiles.

But no date was set for a third summit meeting between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev, at which such a treaty could be signed. Soviet spokesman Gennady Gerasimov said the subject never came up.

Both sides agreed in principle to the missile accord during Shevardnadze's visit to the United States last month.

Shultz is to meet with Gorbachev on Friday and review the findings of eight U.S.-Soviet working groups that have tackled such diverse issues as human rights and chemical warfare.

The dispute over U.S. nuclear warheads on 72 West German missiles appeared settled last month, but was revived by Soviet negotiators in Geneva.

Basically, the Soviets insisted that the warheads, which can be fired only with U.S. permission, be included in a prospective treaty to scrap all U.S. and Soviet intermediate-range missiles.

West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl had offered to dismantle the missiles after the pact was ratified and to return the warheads to the United States.

A U.S. official, briefing American reporters on condition of anonymity, said the dispute now was "basically resolved" in line with last month's formula.

Referring to Shultz's scheduled meeting Friday with Gorbachev, the official said, "I don't think this will be a problem by the end of the day."

But he said some other issues still were in the path of a treaty, including whether Soviet inspectors would be permitted to inspect the dismantling of U.S. cruise missiles in West Germany, Britain, Italy and Belgium.

Nor would the official predict a summit date would be set during Shultz's two-day visit.

Noting that the verification problems and missile-dismantling schedules are still outstanding, he said, "I'm not prepared to predict they'll be all ironed out by Friday night."

when the talks were scheduled to break up.

And yet, assessing four hours of talks between Shultz and Shevardnadze, the official said "the talks were very good today. People are really working at solving problems."

Gerasimov, the Soviet spokesman, said "We are still optimistic about the prospects of working out a treaty."

Blitz contest 'just for fun,' dean says

By Jeff Stead
Collegian Reporter

Students in the College of Architecture have the chance to win an all-expense-paid breakfast prepared by Dean Mark Lapping for their efforts in an around-the-clock contest.

And the french toast breakfast is only one of the awards being donated by the faculty of the College of Architecture for BlitzFest 1987, which begins today at 5 p.m.

"We wanted to give awards like these because they mean a lot more than others would," said Richa Wilson, president of the design council.

BlitzFest was developed by the student organizations of K-State's College of Architecture. The event began as a design competition for students in the college and has grown to incorporate several activities including bringing in guest speakers and alumni.

This year's 24-hour charrette — the college avoids calling the event a competition because "it's just for fun," Wilson said — will be to design a new town center for a town near Manhattan. The name of the town will not be disclosed until the start of the charrette today.

Each team for the charrette will be made up of four people, representing three of the departments in the College of Architecture, he said.

Greg Yager, a former graduate of and instructor at K-State and an associate in the Los Angeles office of RTKL, is coordinating the charrette, Wilson said. Yager will also present an illustrated lecture entitled "Teamwork: The Design Process at RTKL." RTKL is one of the largest architecture firms in the nation, Wilson said.

"Last year we had 13 teams and we are hoping for 20 this year," Wilson said.

Yager will introduce the project at a kickoff dinner for the teams at 5 p.m. Friday in the Big 8 Room in the Union. All of the design solutions will be turned in Saturday at 6 p.m. in the Chang Gallery of the College of Architecture.

Four alumni have accepted invitations to return as honorees and judges for the charrette, Wilson said. They will be honored during a dinner Oct. 22 in the Key Room of the Union.

Today, they will visit classes and meet with students and faculty to share their knowledge and insights, he said.

The BlitzFest will end with the all-college BlitzBash party beginning Saturday at 9 p.m. in Aggieville. At 10 p.m., Yager and the other judges will arrive to announce the winning designs and award prizes.

Wilson said the projects will be placed on exhibit in the Chang Gallery until Nov. 6.

Gala celebrates mall's opening

By Janet Swanson
Agri/Business Editor

More than 1,500 supporters of the Manhattan Arts Council participated in "The Art of It All" gala Sunday night, celebrating the opening of the Manhattan Town Center.

After nearly a decade of planning by city officials and developers, the mall will be officially dedicated and opened at 9:30 this morning.

Of the 85 retail spaces, 51 will be filled and will open following the ceremony. The mall's two anchors, JCPenney and Dillard's, opened earlier this month.

The $24 million mall is located at 3rd Street and Poyntz Avenue. It was developed by Forest City Development and JCP Realty.

The grand opening ceremony will be in the mall's Center Court.

"Everything is going very well," said Mickey Thompson, advertising and marketing director for the mall.

It's traditional for Forest City to sponsor a gala before opening a mall it developed.

"The turnout has been fantastic," said John Biggs, executive director of the council.

Former Gov. John Carlin, Secretary of State Bill Graves, members of the council, Manhattan officials and other dignitaries attended the event.

Tickets sold for $35 each and were reserved. Proceeds from the black-tie optional affair were con-

Center shuts down after loss of funding

By Kathy Winkhofer
Collegian Reporter

The Midwest Sex and Race Desegregation Assistance Center, formerly located in the College of Education, has closed after losing its funding from the federal government.

The center helped public school districts promote equal educational opportunities for all children, regardless of race and sex.

The center lost its funding Sept. 10, after its annual grant application was turned down.

"We felt we submitted the best application yet," said Charles Rankin, former director of the center.

The U.S. Department of Education allocates funding for the desegregation assistance programs called for under Title IV of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. A change in the allocation regulations proposed a decrease in the number of centers across the country from 40 to 10.

The center served a four-state region made up of Iowa, Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska. The regions will have to be re-divided now that the number of centers has decreased, Rankin said.

He said the fewer number of centers will cause resource and cooperation problems.

"Each center developed contacts and resources in its own region," Rankin said.

The center helped school districts by sending its staff members to schools to try to recognize segregation. The staff also prepared and adopted plans to alleviate sexual and racial problems.

The center would try to develop activities in the schools and communities to encourage racial and sexual harmony. The center also tried to make educators aware of race and sex bias in their attitudes and practices and in the materials used in their curriculum.

"We get calls from former clients for help but we can't help them anymore since we are shut down," he

Federal standards for fire protection lacking in Farrell

By Debbie Whilson
Staff Writer

Although several campus buildings do not meet federal fire protection standards, the likelihood of immediately remedying the problem is slim due to limited funding.

"There are certain requirements that older buildings were not equipped with," said John Lambert, director of public safety. "We have requested funds from the (Kansas) Legislature several times to improve on the buildings, but we can only get so much at a time, and there are still changes to be made."

K-State, like all other state institutions, is required to adhere to the National Life Safety Codes written by the National Fire Protection Agency.

Farrell Library is one campus building that does not meet the federal standards.

Although lighted exit signs are supposed to be displayed beside every door in a building, Farrell doesn't have them, Lambert said. "The building has no alarm system," he said. "It costs $15,000 to install a system, and we just have not been able to get the funds."

In addition, the older part of the building does not have outer stairs which can be used for fire exits. In order to leave that part of the building, a person would first have to go into the newer part of the building and find the fire stairs.

The problem with funds is not always a complete lack of them, but a question of where the few available dollars should be used, he said. The last time a formal request was made for money to install fire alarm systems in some campus buildings was 1985.

"There were five buildings on that list," Lambert said. "They Pension plan share values decline Effects of stock market fluctuation hit close to home

By Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

Due largely to the faltering stock market, the value of shares in a major faculty pension plan have declined by about $8.21 per share over the past four weeks, minimizing the steady year-long gains they had made.

The 20-percent decline in the value of shares in the College Retirement Equities Fund of the Teacher Insurance and Annuity Association, the primary provider of a pension plan to K-State faculty, parallels the wild up-and-down swings of the stock market this month, said Claire Sheahan, assistant vice president and public information officer for CREF.

"The market value of the shares inevitably reflects the fluctuations in the stock market that have been going on," Sheahan said.

Individual shares in CREF were listed at approximately $31.85 on Friday. That figure was based on stock market activity from Thursday when the Dow Jones average dropped 77 points. The Dow monitors 30 industrial stocks traded on the New York Stock Exchange.

CREF shares were valued at $40.06 on Sept. 30, said Jennifer Gehrt, K-State manager of employee benefits and records. Since then the stock market has experienced a historic crash and limited recovery. CREF shares were valued at $29.75 on Dec. 31, 1986, Gehrt said.

Sheahan said the price decline was only "on paper" and represented no tangible loss to participants.

It is called a "paper" rise or decline because the price has fluctuated but the actual profit or loss cannot be known until the shares are sold. A profit is realized on the shares when

Questions surface following dog shooting

By Lori Lindstrom
Staff Writer

An Oct. 10 dog shooting in Westmoreland has generated controversy about the authority of the animal control officer to discharge a shotgun within the city limits.

Robert Buss, 206 N. Second St. in Westmoreland, a town of about 500 northeast of Manhattan, put his two dogs out that morning in his fenced back yard. The dogs dug out of the pen, and before Buss could find them, one had been shot by Westmoreland's maintenance and animal control officer, Steve Schiltz.

"He claims he was threatened," Buss said. "My dog was not an aggressive dog. He was obedience-trained. My wife baby-sits for young children, and we wouldn't let the dog near them if we thought he was vicious."

When Buss realized his dogs were missing, he said he went out in search of them. He found one but couldn't locate the other. Buss was later informed his dog had been shot and killed by Schiltz.

"The fact was, I thought it was a mean dog," Schiltz said. "It was in my yard and would not leave."

"He didn't call before or after he shot the dog," Buss said. Schiltz reported he had found the dog loose on another occasion and returned him to the Buss home. "He knew the dog and where we lived," Buss said.

Schiltz, however, said he "did not recognize the dog from an earlier time."

"It's not the first time he has shot dogs," Buss said. "A lot of people are sick and tired of it. We want to find a way to stop it."

Buss said Schiltz did not follow city policy, which is to catch and hold the dog for seven days.

"I don't like someone running around with a shotgun, shooting in town," Buss said.

Schiltz said he "would rather remain silent on the whole situation now that the event is starting to simmer down." He wants it to stay that way while he waits to see what will happen.

Market gets weekend cleanup

NEW YORK — Stock exchange employees put in a second day of weekend work Sunday clearing out debris left by last week's selling storm, while investors and brokers waited for the first signs of how the market might fare this week.

Those signs were expected to come from the Far East, where Monday stock trading begins when it is still Sunday night in the United States.

Stock trading on U.S. and overseas exchanges formed a cyclical relationship last week, with foreign exchanges affecting and being affected by the volatile activity in New York.

Sunday on Wall Street, stock exchange employees and brokers continued to work on eliminating the backlog of paperwork from last Monday and Tuesday, when more than 1.2 billion shares were traded.

Richard Torrenzano, a spokesman for the New York Stock Exchange, said about a half to a third of the exchange's 2,000 employees — who already had spent an unusual Saturday on the job — worked from 10 a.m. until the mid-afternoon to wrap up questioned trades. Those are transactions in which there were disputes about the number of shares or the price of a stock.

"They're making sure that the trades match up, that you buy what you thought you bought and sell what you thought you sold," Torrenzano said. Reporters were not allowed into the exchange on Sunday.

The weekend overtime was necessary because Monday is settlement day for transactions that took place last Monday. Trades are settled — with money paid and securities delivered — five trading days after the transactions are made.

With the backlog out of the way, the exchanges would be ready for this week's trading and brokerage firms would have a better idea of how they fared during a week that saw the Dow Jones industrial average plunge 508 points in one day, then recover some ground to close out the week with a loss of 295.98 points at 1,950.76.

Interstate 335 joins Kansas

TOPEKA — It became legal Friday to drive 65 miles an hour on the Kansas Turnpike between Topeka and Emporia.

Transportation Secretary Horace Edwards said the state was notified that the Federal Highway Administration had approved adding the 50-mile stretch of the turnpike to the U.S. interstate highway system.

The Topeka-Emporia segment will be designated as Interstate 335, Edwards said.

Earlier this year, Congress raised the legal speed limit from 55 to 65 miles an hour on rural interstate routes — those outside urbanized areas with populations of 50,000 or more.

The Kansas Turnpike from Kansas City to Topeka qualified because it doubles as Interstate 70.

The turnpike from Emporia to the Oklahoma border south of Wichita also qualified because it doubles as Interstate 35.

However, the 50 miles between Topeka and Emporia didn't qualify because it was not designated as part of the interstate system.

I-70 runs west out of Topeka toward Junction City, Salina and on to Colorado.

I-35 runs southwest out of Kansas City, past Ottawa and on to Emporia. At Emporia, it takes the route of the turnpike on to Oklahoma.

Adding the Topeka-Emporia stretch means Kansas now has about 730 miles of rural interstate highway that qualifies for the 65 mph speed limit.

Company fights smoking plan

WASHINGTON — By the time 3,000 blue-and-white Mailgrams had arrived at the office of Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., his staff began to think something was up.

Though the terse messages were worded differently, each one told the senator to back off his attempt to limit smoking on airline flights.

But while the telegrams bore the names of New Jersey residents, they were written, paid for and sent by Philip Morris, U.S.A., the nation's largest seller of cigarettes.

The Western Union messages, still arriving at Senate offices by the hundreds each day, are part of a computer-orchestrated campaign by the cigarette company against Lautenberg's plan to ban smoking on all domestic flights of two hours or less.

Philip Morris spokesman Steven Weiss confirmed the Mailgram campaign. Weiss said he was unable to find out how many messages have been sent, or how much the effort has cost.

NU buried waste, officials say

MEAD, Neb. — If a low-level radioactive waste site is located in Nebraska by a five-state compact, it won't be the first one for the state, state officials say.

The University of Nebraska buried small quantities of low-level radioactive waste in five trenches on its 9,500-acre Field Laboratory near Mead in Saunders County in 1977-79.

The low-level radioactive waste includes paper, glass, lab vials and animal carcasses contaminated during research at the university's Lincoln campus and its medical center in Omaha.

Two trenches are near a defunct waste water treatment facility on the eastern boundary of the agricultural research complex south of here. The other trenches are inside two long diamond-shaped buildings once used to assemble bombs for World War II.

Before being acquired by NU in 1962, the Field Laboratory was part of a 17,000-acre ordnance plant operated by the federal government. NU has used and still uses some ordnance structures to store property including low-level radioactive waste.

Tabloids allege 'Royal friction'

LONDON — Brazen headlines on Sunday alleged more friction in the 6-year-old marriage of Prince Charles and Princess Diana, but critics of the rumor mill say the two are victims of a boorish battle for readers.

The tabloids claim the couple, who recently spent five weeks apart, have marital difficulties. Critics say the stories are based on hearsay and fantasy and make life intolerable for the royals.

The weekly tabloid The People, with 3 million circulation, said Sunday that Charles, 38, and Diana, 26, "had a blazing row during the few hours they spent together last week."

The report, attributed to unidentified "close palace friends," said Diana shouted: "You are holding our marriage up to ridicule. You want me to behave like a happy, loving, dutiful wife always smiling and you...shut yourself away in Scotland for weeks."

Another tabloid, the News of the World, with a 4.8 million circulation, said: "Prince Charles and Princess Diana will today (Sunday) square up for a High Noon-style showdown over their crumbling marriage."

"She will be gunning...over his friendship with society beauty Lady Dale Tyron...He will be shooting from the hip over her...antics in London during his month-long holiday in the Scottish Highlands."

NOW prepared to wage post-Bork fight

President says organization may also reject next nominee

By Sally Neary
Collegian Reporter

Although the National Organization for Women has just completed its campaign to oppose the nomination of Robert Bork to the U.S. Supreme Court, the group is prepared to fight again if necessary, NOW's president said Saturday in Manhattan.

Molly Yard, NOW's national president, said the organization's game plan for the next Supreme Court nominee is to take a wait and see attitude.

"According to President Reagan's statement, he's going to give us somebody exactly like Robert Bork," said Yard, who spoke at the Kansas NOW Convention in the Union.

She said she believes the conservatives of Congress, wanting a justice to help them carry out their agenda, will do their best to persuade Reagan to nominate someone like Bork.

In addition to its anti-Bork campaign, NOW has been active in civil rights causes, including the recent march for the Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights Bill in Washington, D.C.

She said the march was effective and made a deep impression on Congress.

"My guess is there will be many more sponsors on the Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights Bill as a result of the march," Yard said.

She said she finds the AIDS issue "mind-boggling," adding that AIDS is a major public health issue, and the administration should be treating it as a major problem facing the country.

"We should be putting money into research for finding a treatment, a vaccine and a cure," Yard said.

NOW will be pushing hard to get the Civil Rights Restoration Act passed in the 1988 legislative session, Yard said.

The act has been in Congress since the Supreme Court gutted Title IX, she said. Title IX was an amendment to the Education Act of 1972 which said any educational institution that took federal tax dollars could not discriminate based on sex.

However, a 5-4 Supreme Court decision ruled the law should not be interpreted to mean the whole institution, but only the part of the institution that received the federal funds. As a result, Rep. Claudine Schneider, R-Rhode Island, immediately introduced a bill which said Congress clearly intended to mean the whole institution should be covered.

William Bradford Reynolds, head of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, said the language in Title IX is the same as the language in the Older Americans Act, the Disabled Act and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

He said the restoration act should apply to minorities, women, the elderly and the disabled.

"We are all working together to try and restore it, but so far we haven't been successful," Yard said.

However, NOW's bottom line issue remains the Equal Rights Amendment, and the group has a large number of sponsors in Congress, she said.

"For the first time, we have sympathetic committees in both the House and Senate," Yard said.

The four- to eight-year campaign will involve doing a careful legislative history and looking at the wording of the amendment, she said.

"We know we must also change the faces in the legislature in order to be successful," Yard said. "We will put a lot of energy into getting women to run in the state legislatures."

She also blasted Reagan on his

She said she believes the administration has sent a message that it's OK to ignore civil rights legislation.

"If it weren't for the federal court system, we could be in a much worse position," Yard said.

Blood drive begins this week; initial numbers down

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

Once again, it is time for the American Red Cross bloodmobile to come to K-State, but this year the count is down.

At this time last year, there were 1,400 appointments, said Lori Stevens of the Red Cross. This year, 707 people have signed up to give blood.

The bloodmobile will be in the Union from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Tuesday through Friday.

Stevens, who is a K-State graduate now working as a blood services consultant, said, "It is important for students to know that they can donate blood without an appointment. We do accept walk-ins."

She said there will be a sign-up table from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday in the Union.

"We need more appointments," Stevens said.

The K-State bloodmobile is well-known, she said, because it is the most well-structured bloodmobile in the region. It is the biggest blood drive in the region and, twice a year, the students, faculty, staff and administration at K-State are responsible for supplying the entire regional blood supply for a whole week.

"K-State has the highest daily goal (350 units) of any college or university in Kansas," Stevens said.

K-State's yearly goal of 2,800 units of blood exceeds The Wichita State University's goal of 500 units and the University of Kansas' goal of 1,600 units.

Stevens said the K-State bloodmobile is successful due to the support from students, faculty and administration.

"It (K-State's bloodmobile) serves as a model to other colleges," she said. "The University is performing a public service."

Elections can coincide with pre-enrollment

Voting. Student Senate wants students to get out there and vote. In order to raise the percentage of students voting in Student Governing Association elections, Senate is considering increasing the number of polling places from two to four.

Students can currently vote in the Union and the Veterinary Medicine Center. A bill before Senate would make Derby Food Center and Ackert Hall additional polling places on campus.

Senate's goal of increasing the percentage of students voting in the student governing elections is commendable. But senators are faced with the problem of controlling the number of times a person has voted.

The ideal solution, of course, is a computerized network which could be used at all the polling places on campus. Unfortunately, this option is not open to Senate since a network such as this is unavailable.

By increasing the polling places by two, the problems Senate would face to keep the elections fair would increase the work during the voting process, and the number of voters gained would probably be few in comparison to the extra work necessary.

If increasing the number of voters is what Senate is looking for, it should set up a polling system that is easy for the students to use and doesn't require an unnecessary trip.

A solution that is not ideal but would make the elections accessible to a majority of students without making them go out of their way would be to hand voting ballots to students as they pre-enroll for the spring semester.

Voting would last while pre-enrollment was occurring, and results would not be made until after voting had ended, thus preventing any voter bias by reporting daily results. This method would increase the visibility of voting to all students because almost everyone pre-enrolls.

Students who are not returning to school in the spring or those who choose not to pre-enroll would be able to receive ballots by going to Farrell Library and voting.

If Senate is serious about attempting to increase the number of students voting in elections, it should take the ballot to them because students aren't coming to the ballot.

Plans should be made for aging population

A study by a U.S. state department agency has shown the number of people more than 80 years old will increase to 101 million by the year 2020.

The increase from 35 million people in 1980 to the estimate 33 years from now is startling enough, but the effects on policy-making worldwide could prove more so.

What difference could this possibly make to most K-State students today?

In 2020, today's 18-year-old freshmen will be 51 years old, and today's 22-year-old seniors will be 55. They will be nearing the traditional end of their professional careers and getting ready to join a retired-age population that also will have been growing since the early 1980s.

They will probably be joining the majority of the population and not the minority.

Now is the time to start making policy decisions to deal with a population that is getting older. This society is mostly a reactionary society.

It deals with problems when they become big problems — when there is a crisis situation. The current frenzy in dealing with AIDS is a good example of this reactionary thinking.

Most of the baby-boom generation will be in this future population. Society has changed to accommodate this group and the changes have come around quickly where changes in actions for a societal group is concerned.

Costs for taking care of the elderly today have proven to be staggering, and the costs in the future should be even more. Students today will be paying for the care of the elderly in the future and they might even be paying for their own care.

Care for that older population cannot be developed and paid for overnight. Now is not too late to start planning for the future.

People are going to have to take the elderly into consideration today to start those processes for change.

If not, a reaction to a crisis in 2020 might come 33 years too late.

Rationalization can't change Pat Robertson's incompetence

As a journalist in general and the editor of a college paper in particular, I often find myself rationalizing over things. And rationalization always results in insecurity and self-doubt.

Despite what readers may believe, decisions on various aspects of the newspaper business aren't black-and-white. They are shrouded in every hue of gray imaginable.

For instance, every day we are faced with questions such as: Should this photo go in the paper? Should that story be printed? Is this word obscene enough to censor? Is that story free advertising?

And, regardless of the decision I make or the staff makes, there is probably just as much reason to have made the opposite decision. It just depends on what the gut tells you at that moment.

As the saying goes, and as one of my colleagues said just the other night, you can rationalize your life away.

And that's the truth. It is with these thoughts that I preface this column on the candidacy of Pat Robertson. Not only has the evangelist and GOP candidate been embroiled in controversy lately, but so have the media. But each for different reasons.

Robertson's controversy has been partly — and I stress partly — due to the revelation that he fathered his first child before he and his wife said "I do." The media's controversy has been wholly — and I stress wholly — because they reported that revelation.

So, who's right and who's wrong here? Many say the media are because they reported something that's no one's business. Many, including myself, say Robertson deserved to have this character trait revealed. For what reason? Would any other candidates deserve to have a similar thing revealed about them?

I don't know. That's just one more thing that would have to be rationalized at the time. But in Robertson's case, the answer is as

Commentary

DERON JOHNSON
Editor

emphatic as one of his sermons. He deserved to have this past tidbit revealed because of his consistently "holier-than-thou" attitude.

Pre-marital sex is one of probably innumerable things on Robertson's list for which people should be damned. And because it was discovered that he had indeed engaged in pre-marital sex, it immediately became news.

When Gary Hart challenged the media to follow him around and they discovered his "fling," it immediately became news. Rightly or wrongly, anything that makes the candidate look like a hypocrite is newsworthy, especially when that hypocrisy is so blatant.

In Robertson's case, his hypocrisy is even more blatant than that of Hart or Joe Biden, the senator who plagiarized and lied. Robertson has said in the past that acquired immune deficiency syndrome was God's punishment to homosexuals for their "sinful" lifestyle. If that's true, which of course it is not, then Robertson's current downfall must be his punishment for, as he put it, "sowing his wild oats."

However, my disapproval of Robertson goes far beyond the gray area of revealing his moral inconsistencies. He is quickly proving to be a dangerous candidate, and that's not just my partisan self talking. That also is not a gray issue: It is the sharpest contrast of black-and-white.

The most offensive thing is that he believes — truly believes — that he is the commensurate candidate simply because he has a solid belief in God. Never mind that he is politically lame.

And that's not just because he's never held a political office. Jesse Jackson has never held office either. However, he's being regarded as a legitimate political contender because of his mass appeal and usually level-headed proposals. If anything, his race presents more of a challenge for him to overcome right now than his religious career.

No, Robertson's political naivete is much more of a problem than his religious convictions. Consider the recent weekend conference of Republican leaders from 13 Western states when Robertson took nearly all of his GOP counterparts on, including first lady Nancy Reagan, who was scheduled to undergo a mastectomy later that day. In addition to verbally attacking about a dozen GOP leaders — including President Reagan — he also took on striking teachers, Planned Parenthood and anti-apartheid activists.

Although Robertson may have the Ten Commandments down pat, he needs to learn the first commandment of politics: Thou shalt not attack your own political allies.

Another idea of Robertson's which I find appalling is that he is advocating the dismantlement of the Department of Education to get "God back into the classroom." Has Robertson ever heard of a small constitutional provision regarding the separation of church and state? Is there a law that prohibits a student from praying in school? If there is, I'd sure like Robertson to quote it to me.

It's obvious why Robertson wants in office. He has a religious agenda to carry out, and he's determined to disregard anything and everything necessary to see that it's implemented.

Robertson should stay in his pulpit where he can spread his distorted ramblings to a limited audience.

He most certainly doesn't deserve to hold the highest office in the most powerful nation in the world.

Hotel Operations class willing to learn

Students petition for more hours

By Cindie Baldwin
Collegian Reporter

It is unusual, if not rare, to find students so enthusiastic about a class that they petition for more class-time hours.

Yet in the Department of Hotel, Restaurant, Institution Management and Dietetics, a petition was signed by the entire Hotel Operations class to do just that — spend more time in class.

"This is strange, but we wanted to learn more. There just was not enough time in the class to get out all we needed."

—Sherry Sims

"This is strange, but we wanted to learn more. There just was not enough time in the class to get out all we needed," said Sherry Sims, senior in leisure studies.

In return for this willingness to learn, the College of Human Ecology granted the students a one-hour-credit class to go along with the four-hour Hotel Operations class.

Don MacLaurin, instructor of hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics and instructor of the Hotel Operations class, has found the students are enthusiastic and willing to spend more hours to learn about the hotel and restaurant business.

"It is wonderful to see such enthusiasm in the students involved in the hotel and restaurant department," said Cathy Kolenda, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

The Hotel Operations class, which was offered for the first time this semester, requires a student to spend two hours a week in lecture and 96 hours working and observing in a local hotel.

Each student works at the hotel of his or her choice doing a variety of jobs in the hotel. Jobs are in the front office, food and beverage, sales, banquets and catering, accounting, housekeeping, maintenance and registration.

The students have a two-week visitation period in each department. Sims has found banquets to be one of her favorite departments.

"I think it is exciting to be able to design what people are going to have," said Sims. "You are also free to design it any way you would like."

Susan Davis, senior in restaurant management, enjoys working in the food and beverage department.

"I have found that the hands-on experience is the most beneficial to me," Davis said.

The students, who are not paid for the work they do at the hotel, work under the supervision of each department head.

At the end of the semester, the stu-management, answers the phone at the University Inn. Cox and Fasse are working for part of a four-hour Hotel Operations class.

dents are evaluated by their work supervisor as well as by MacLaurin, who acts as a liaison between the hotel and the students.

The students are also required to do a semester report providing ways to correct a problem in a suggested area in the hotel or restaurant field needing improvement.

For her project, Kolenda revamped the entire filing system for the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome.

The filing system, now in use at the Holidome, "is working so far," said Kolenda.

MacLaurin said the students working in the hotels are "observers only," and he emphasized K-State is not connected financially with the hotels in any way.

NU pounds K-State to stay undefeated

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

LINCOLN, Neb. — If the National Enquirer ran a sports section, the headline might read something like this: "Could K-State football coach Stan Parrish become the next Bert Parks?"

After his Wildcats were handed a 56-3 loss Saturday courtesy of No. 2 Nebraska, Parrish asked, "Was this homecoming?" When told yes, he replied: "I've seen more queens this year than the Miss America Pageant. We're everybody's homecoming (opponent)."

Whereas K-State, 0-7 overall and 0-3 in the Big Eight Conference, had its shining moments against No. 1 Oklahoma, little good could be found in its performance against the second-ranked Cornhuskers, who were without five starters.

"The only good thing that happened today is we're through playing them," Parrish said. "Getting beat like that doesn't do anything good for you."

"It wasn't much of a contest, but I thought Kansas State played pretty well. They threw the ball hard and well at times," said Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne, whose team went to 7-0 and 3-0.

Nebraska, which played most of

Staff/Brad Fanshier

reserve wingback Dana Brinson fumbled and the miscue was recovered by K-State sophomore linebacker Alan Smith. Three plays later, Porter was good from 29 yards out.

Offensively, the Cornhuskers were able to move the ball at will against K-State either by the big play or a sustained drive. Nebraska scored on runs of 49, 46 and 50 yards and a 40-yard pass. The Cornhuskers also added touchdowns on four drives that took 10 plays and covered as much as 88 yards.

Defensively, Nebraska limited K-State's rushing attack to 98 yards. Junior fullback Lee Pickett was the Wildcats' leading rusher with 44 yards on nine carries.

"We couldn't run it a lick. There'll be a lot of hidden yardage when the game was well out of hand," Parrish said. "That team closed down the run on us better than anybody has all year long," Parrish said.

The pass didn't work too well against the Cornhuskers either. Gary Swim completed 12 passes for 118 yards, but his longest completion of the day was for 15 yards and 17 attempts were thrown away under a heavy rush.

Against Nebraska's offense, K-State at times had eight men on the line and tried a variety of blitzes.

"(K-State) gave us a little trouble. They did some kind of interesting things up front," Osborne said.

"We tried (to blitz), but they do a good job of picking up that kind of stuff," Parrish added.

Cornhusker quarterback Steve Taylor limped off the field in the second quarter, but was diagnosed as having only a minor injury and didn't see action the rest of the game.

"I was hoping (Osborne) would let me back in, but he told me at halftime they have a pretty tough game next week and that I should stay out," Taylor said.

The big question in K-State's locker room following the game was who was better, Oklahoma or Nebraska? The Wildcats were the first team in 16 seasons to play the two top-ranked teams back-to-back.

"I'd give Nebraska the edge because of their characteristic and their respect toward us," Swim said.

Quarterback Tim Hanson chose "Oklahoma, only because offensively they're a littler faster."

"They're No. 1 and 1A," Parrish said. "When the (NU-OU) game comes, I'd like both of them to be at full guns because our conference is going to have the national champion going to the Orange Bowl."

Cornhuskers dig into playbook bag of tricks

LINCOLN, Neb. — When Nebraska plays a team like K-State, all they're supposed to need to do to win is play the kind of grind-it-out, power football that's made the Cornhuskers a national powerhouse for the past 20 years.

No fancy stuff necessary, right? On most days, this would be correct.

But on this particular Saturday, No. 2 Nebraska had to dig a bit deeper in the playbook than usual to get enough touchdowns to blast the winless Wildcats out of Memorial Stadium 56-3.

Granted, No. 2 Nebraska's offense did manage 662 yards against K-State. Still, quite a few of those yards came on plays that aren't quite what you'd call integral components of the 'Huskers attack.

"We should be able to drive down and score without stuff like that," 285-pound Nebraska offensive tackle Keven Lightner admitted.

But early in the game, with K-State throwing a number of unusual defensive formations at the 'Huskers, Nebraska was forced to resort to some plays that 'Husker coach Tom Osborne doesn't usually pull out until they play Oklahoma.

The first came on a third-down punting situation with Nebraska leading 7-0 in the first quarter. I-back Ken Clark took the snap on a fake punt and ran down the left sideline for a 27-yard gain and a first down. The play kept the drive alive and six plays later, Nebraska scored to lead 14-0.

"We were going to use it in the South Carolina game, but the center was the only guy on the team that didn't know it," Osborne said of the fake. "But we showed it on the film, so we thought we had might as well let it fly and get some practice on it."

Trick play No.2 resulted in the touchdown that put the 'Huskers ahead 21-0. Richard Bell took a near-perfectly executed wingback reverse handoff down the sideline for a 46-yard touchdown. The play fooled just about every defender wearing purple and the ones who knew what was actually happening were sent flying by Nebraska blockers who allowed Bell to score practically untouched.

The third play — a 40-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Clete Blakeman to split end Hendley Hawkins with time running out in the second quarter and Nebraska up 28-0 — wasn't necessarily so tricky. Nonetheless, it still managed to fool the K-State defense, in particular the defensive backfield, whose coverage obviously suffered some sort of breakdown.

"I was really surprised that we were able to complete that pass because I thought everybody in the stadium knew that with four seconds left, we were going deep with the ball," Osborne said.

Hawkins couldn't believe what he was seeing in the coverage on the play, either.

"I thought I'd just try to outrun the guy, but he really bit on the hook, so it made it a pretty easy pattern," Hawkins said. "There's four seconds left and the guy is on the 14-yard line."

K-State coach Stan Parrish vehemently argued for an offensive pass interference call as halftime began and was slapped with a 15-yard unsportsmanlike-conduct penalty. Later, Parrish said his unkind words to the official were inspired more by his frustration than by disagreement with the non-call.

"What always happens in the play right before the half, we give up a touchdown," Parrish said.

Ahead by large margins in the second half, Nebraska only found the need to reach into its bag of tricks in the second half one more time.

Basketball ticket sales reach 4,000

By The Collegian Staff

"Tent City" in front of Ahearn Field House is history, and ticket manager Carol Adolph got a well-deserved rest this weekend.

When student basketball season tickets went on sale Friday, more than 3,200 tickets were issued, which ended the 15-day camping session some students endured for quality seats.

Include the 800 tickets bought by members of the "I Contributed A Twenty" club, and more than 4,000 student seats have been sold.

"That's quite something considering we sold a total of 3,300 season tickets last year," Adolph said.

Adolph said about 200 student tickets remained, and public season ticket sales were "coming in very well." There is a possibility Wildcat basketball "could sell out."

For the opening day of sales last year, 14 tents were pitched in front of Ahearn and about 60 people lined up at the door to purchase tickets. The first-day total last year ran 2,385 seats sold.

By comparison, more than 200 people were lined up to buy tickets Friday morning and various living groups had set up 28 tents during the camping out stage.

Twins claim Series title

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — The Minnesota Twins silenced the critics and the St. Louis Cardinals in the deafening din of their decibel Dome to win their first World Series.

The Twins won Game 7 Sunday night, beating St. Louis 4-2 behind Most Valuable Player Frank Viola's determination and the roar of the record crowd of 55,376.

This was the first time the home team won every game in the World Series, and it came in the year the Twins were nearly invincible at the Metrodome.

"No team in history has won all four at home, but no team in history has had to play here," St. Louis Manager Whitey Herzog said.

Minnesota finished 62-25 at its park. The Twins' 29-52 road record was the worst among any World Series winner, but it didn't matter because they wound up the season at home.

"We have great fans. We had great fans all season," Minnesota Manager Tom Kelly said. "But the boys on the field had to get the job done."

And the Twins did. They won the final two games of the Series, with Greg Gagne's infield hit breaking a sixth-inning tie and putting them ahead for good.

The Twins became the 10th different team to win the Series in 10 years and finished with the worst regular-season record of any World Series champion.

Viola, who was pitching on three days' rest after winning Game 1 and losing Game 4, was named the MVP after giving up six hits over eight innings with seven strikeouts and not a single walk.

Viola, who last lost in the Metrodome on May 22 and won 11 decisions after that, settled down after allowing two runs in the second inning and gave up only two more hits before Jeff Reardon pitched a 1-2-3 ninth to set off the celebration in the Twin Cities.

"I didn't want to take him out," Minnesota Manager Tom Kelly said, "but that's what we've done all year. When it gets to the ninth, we give the ball to Jeff Reardon."

There were no arguments from Viola. "He's been doing it all year, coming in to close the door," he said of Reardon. "Why change now?"

Viola said winning the award was a "great, great honor but I couldn't do it without the other 23 guys."

"The key is getting ahead in the count, 0-1, 1-2. I didn't do that in Game 4," Viola said.

If Viola was the most valuable player, the Metrodome was the most valuable place.

The Twins were nearly invincible at the Metrodome, finishing 62-25, including three routs over St. Louis.

The Cardinals, the top road team in the majors, were swallowed up by a raucous record crowd of 55,376 as they failed for the second time in three years to win their 10th title. A couple of controversial calls by umpires at first base — which haunted St. Louis in 1985 — and some maneuvers by Herzog that went wrong left the crippled Cardinals one game short.

Herzog, though, would not blame the umpiring for this one.

"I don't want to comment on the umpiring because in all fairness I felt they (the Twins) played better than we did and it would take something away from them."

The Twins scored 72 runs in beating Detroit in the playoffs and then St. Louis, the most ever scored by a club in the postseason.

Minnesota also managed to overcome the Cardinals' success in do-or-die situations. St. Louis is now 8-3 in Game 7s, still the most victories by any team in seventh games.

In this, the Year of the Home Run, the Twins manufactured the winning run Cardinals-style.

Danny Cox, pitching on two days' rest and in relief for the first time since 1984, walked Tom Brunansky and Kent Hrbek leading off the sixth with the score 2-2. That finished Cox, who failed to retire any of the five batters he faced, and he was ejected by home-plate umpire Dave Phillips as he exited. That brought back more memories of 1985, when Cardinals pitcher Joaquin Andujar was tossed from Game 7, in which Kansas City routed St. Louis 11-0.

Todd Worrell walked pinch-hitter Roy Smalley, playing on his 35th birthday, before striking out Dan Gladden with the bases loaded for the second out. Gagne followed with a sharp grounder that third baseman Tom Lawless backhanded, and Gagne beat the one-hop throw to first.

The Twins, whose starting lineup outthumbed St. Louis' 183-32, scored an insurance run in the eighth when Tim Laudner singled and came home on Gladden's double.

The Twins came back despite getting two runners thrown out at the plate by left fielder Vince Coleman and possibly losing a run on Phillips' call in the second.

Trailing 2-1, Minnesota tied it in the fifth. Joe Magrane, who lost the opener and was the sixth rookie to ever start a Game 7, got the first out and Gagne followed with a grounder to first baseman Jim Lindeman. Magrane covered first and replays seemed to show he tagged the bag after getting Lindeman's throw, but umpire Lee Weyer called Gagne safe.

Herzog brought in Cox, and Kirby Puckett hit the first pitch for an RBI double to right-center. Gary Gaetti walked, but Puckett was caught trying to advance to third on a pitch in the dirt and Gaetti was thrown out at the plate on Don Baylor's single to left.

Herzog gambled on his lineup, starting reserve catcher Steve Lake for the first time in the Series. That move paid off when Lake and regular catcher Tony Pena, in the DH spot, hit RBI singles in the second inning.

But Herzog left himself open to second-guessers when he took out Magrane in the fifth and brought in Cox, who obviously was tired.

Minnesota deserves first title

The "Boys of Summer" are gone for yet another year, and the Minnesota Twins have the winter to bask in the glory of being world champions of America's national pastime.

The 1987 baseball season came to a fitting end Sunday evening as the Twins, 150-to-1 longshots at the beginning of the year to become World Series winners, brought down the curtain on a year that for them most assuredly wasn't pretty but was at last successful.

Just think about it all for a moment, and then wonder how it happened for this most memorable team.

■ This was the same Minnesota crew that won but 85 regular season games in a division most experts consider the worst in major league baseball.

■ This was a team with a general manager, Andy MacPhail, who is 34, and a manager, Tom Kelly, who is 36.

■ This was a team that had but two World Series starting pitchers with over eight wins during the regular season.

■ This was a team that won but 31 road games all season and lost 56.

■ This was a team from the state of Minnesota. You remember Minnesota, don't you? It's the fine state that gave us Hubert H. Humphrey, four Super Bowl-losing Viking squads and Walter Mondale.

But, then again, when one looks a bit deeper, it really seems to make sense that Minnesota was able to treat the screaming crazies at the Metrodome Sunday to an experience they'll never forget.

■ This was a team that won a remarkable 56 games at home during the regular season and finished with 62 home wins overall.

■ This was a team with a manager, Kelly, that the players pushed ownership to retain on a full-time basis after his interim role last season.

■ This was a team from the American League Western Division — a division, regardless of what anyone says during the regular year, that has produced the two of the last three world champs (in Kansas City and Minnesota).

■ And, possibly most importantly, this was a team that genuinely enjoyed playing together. In fact, according to third baseman Gary Gaetti, "we loved coming to the ballpark every day because we loved each other. That's what made us tick."

Five key players remained from a Twins team that lost 100 games in 1982: Gaetti, catcher Tim Laudner, first baseman Kent Hrbek, outfielder Tom Brunansky, and pitcher Frank Viola, the World Series MVP. With a nucleus like that and veteran players like Bert Blyleven and Don Baylor around, how could this team lose?

The answer? It couldn't. Minnesota brought it home — finally.

Crews end season with intrasquad regatta

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

It was competitive, yet fun. K-State Crew closed out fall practices for its 25th "Silver Anniversary" season with the annual Class Day Regatta Saturday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Strong northerly winds limited most of the day's events to Elk's Cove, but Mother Nature calmed down enough later in the day to allow the men's varsity eight to race on the lake's main course.

In that race, the sophomore-junior crew won with a 6:02.25 on the 2,000-meter course, upsetting the favored seniors by 10 seconds.

"(The sophomores and juniors) really layed it on 'em," Coach Don Rose said. "The seniors maybe led for 10 or 15 strokes. The juniors looked really good (in winning)."

Rose said the weather conditions made the upset victory even more impressive.

"We had some rolling water out there...it makes more drag on the boats and makes it harder for the men to get their blades in and out of the water," Rose said.

"I marvel at (their time) yet. I say the six minutes for an eight-man crew over 2,000 meters, which is 35 feet less than a mile and a quarter, compares to a four-minute mile (in track). I haven't had a men's varsity here that I can remember doing this. It's just delightful," he added.

In other races, the senior women, with the addition of one sophomore, sprinted to victory against the juniors, 1:44.7 to 1:45.7; one freshman men's crew topped another by more than 15 seconds; and the Manhattan High School girls' varsity beat the K-State freshmen women, 1:46.9 to 1:49.9. In that race, the K-State squad was given a one-length head start.

All crews maintained tradition and wore various costumes during the Donning masks and bandannas, members of the junior women's crew team compete against the senior women in Saturday's annual Class Day day's festivities.

As for his crews' performances in the off-season, Rose said the varsity eight will be looking to improve on last year's fourth-place finish at the Midwest Regionals. During the last three years, K-State has gone from not fielding an eight-man crew to eighth-, sixth- and fourth-place finishes in regional competition.

"We're certainly planning to make an improvement of (last year's regional finish)," Rose said. "It looks like we have a good chance based on what we did this fall."

Among the crew's off-season accomplishments were the men's varsity eight winning the Head of the Des Moines River Regatta for the third consecutive year.

"I like to have it so (the team) works out hard, and yet they're having fun..."

—Don Rose

"I hope we can turn that promise into reality," Rose said. "There's usually a lot of promise at the beginning of every sport at the beginning of every year, and usually the reality falls short of promise."

The crew's off-season conditioning program, Rose said, will include soccer and biathlon-triathlon competition.

Regatta at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. The scrimmage ended fall practices for the crew's 25th "Silver Anniversary" season.

"We're off the water for the most part because we've rowed long and hard and it's time to take a break from that," he said.

And how does a landlocked sport such as soccer prepare a team for rowing?

"Soccer's a great conditioning game. It gets your heart, lungs and legs (in good shape). Anytime you play a game, it just isn't dregery. I like to have it so (the team) works out hard, and yet they're having fun and look forward to it," Rose said.

At the annual banquet following the Class Day Regatta, highlights included naming captains and presenting awards. Amanda Robinson was named the women's captain and Curt Becker was elected men's captain.

Brad Johnson was awarded the "Most Inspirational Wildcat" award, and Beverly Moomaw and Ben J. Stott were co-recipients of the "Don Rose Award" given to a non-rowing person.

Moomaw raised enough money for a new set of carbon oars and an electronic amplification system and timer. Stott is the promoter of the Heart of America Regatta in Kansas City and donated a racing shell to the crew.

Baseball squad splits twin bill

By Russ Ewy
Sports Writer

K-State's baseball team split a doubleheader with Creighton Saturday to finish its fall season after compiling a 7-1 record.

The Wildcats dropped the first game to the Bluejays, 8-5, before rolling to a 6-1 win in the second game, which had K-State Head Coach Mike Clark assessing his team for the spring season.

"I thought we played well," Clark said. "The kids played hard, we learned from our mistakes and I thought we did a real commendable job, considering the obstacles we had to overcome."

"A couple of kids stood out and it looks like they'll have real opportunity to be in our starting lineup (in the spring). We like what we see. It's just a matter of us improving and coming out in the spring ready to be a good baseball team."

The injury situation that has plagued the baseball team will be a key factor in determining how the 'Cats will fare in their spring campaign, according to Clark.

"When we get the other kids back, I think we'll be pretty respectable," Clark said. "A lot hinges on that. If the kids don't come back, then we're limited in that we don't have a lot of options at certain positions if we have injuries."

A more positive aspect to the injury situation is the players who filled vacated positions and caught the attention of the coaches.

"We're in a situation, particularly with our position players, where we're not real deep and having the injuries in the fall has allowed us to play some kids and some kids have really shown us a lot of good things that we like to see," Clark said.

Clark said he is also looking forward to having a strong backing by K-State fans.

Dan Skala is tagged out by Creighton's Ryan Martindale at home plate after hitting a triple during the second game of Saturday's double header. The 'Cats lost the first game 8-5 and won the second and final game of the fall season 6-1.

Names on bricks in plaza add to 'community touch'

By The Collegian Staff

More than 1,400 bricks costing $20 each were sold last spring by the Manhattan Main Street Project in the name of posterity.

"Make Your Mark in Downtown History" was the theme of the project. Each brick purchased was inscribed with the name of the person or family who purchased it. The bricks were then laid into a sidewalk in the Manhattan Town Center's plaza.

The idea was sponsored to add a "community touch" to the downtown development project, said Brenda Spencer, Manhattan Main Street Project manager.

Each brick cost the Manhattan Main Street Project $10. The additional $10 paid by each person or family was placed in an endowment fund for activities in the plaza, said Karen Davis, assistant director of community development.

Brent Bowman, architect of the plaza, suggested the idea to the Manhattan City Commission after seeing it done at a mall in Portland, Ore. Jenne Andrews, Manhattan, said she and her husband, Rusty, bought a brick "just for fun."

"We bought one so the kids could see their names on it in the years to come," Andrews said.

Lillian Byrd, Manhattan, said she was disappointed in the brick she bought because she said the inscription was hard to read, even when she stood directly in front of it.

Spencer said she had heard comments about the inscriptions, but said the city and architect had been concerned that the names would be too distracting.

"They purposely made the decision just to engrave and not add color to make the inscriptions less noticeable," Spencer said.

The fund-raiser was a city project, but the Manhattan Main Street organization volunteered to be involved and agreed to sell the bricks.

RCPD investigating bomb threat made against Town Center mall

By The Collegian Staff

The Riley County Police Department is investigating a bomb threat made against the Manhattan Town Center Saturday afternoon. Sgt. Calvin Weese said the caller told the department that a bomb would go off in the mall at 3 p.m. Saturday.

Weese said the mall's management was notified of the threat, but he was unsure if the building was evacuated.

Chris Heavey, general manager of the Town Center, refused comment Sunday afternoon.

The call, which is considered a terroristic threat, is classified as a Class C felony, Weese said. If convicted, the caller would face a minimum sentence of one to two years in prison, and a maximum of two to five years. In addition, a $10,000 maximum fine may be imposed.

Weese believed the call was made by a white male, and there are currently no suspects.

In cases such as Saturday's call, Weese said it is the department's policy to notify building management and let it determine further action.

"If we receive a bomb threat or the store has received a bomb threat...it's up to the store management to decide 'Do we evacuate?'" Weese said. "We can't force anybody to close their store."

A gallery, located at the south end of the mall, opened its display with works by K-State art instructors. Roger Rouston, assistant professor of art, was on hand to discuss the art.

"All of the works are on consignment," he said. "Most of us (faculty members) work with galleries outside of the city and state."

"This (the gallery) gives us very good exposure in the community. We are all a well-kept secret," Rouston said.

After Nov. 25, professional artists will use the gallery for a display area.

"From what I understand, Forest City has agreed to use this space as a gallery for six months to see how it is received," Rouston said.

Campaign rivals Taylor would emphasize curriculum evaluation

By Karen Allen
Collegian Reporter

Jack Taylor, junior in arts and sciences, will emphasize a curriculum evaluation program during his campaign for student body president.

Taylor has served as an All-University Open House Coordinator and campus tour guide. He currently serves on the student body president's cabinet as college council coordinator. These positions have enabled him to work closely with the deans of the colleges, Taylor said, adding that all the deans are in favor of an evaluation of the curriculum.

An evaluation every five years would allow each curriculum to stay up-to-date with technology, he said.

"Students are prepared when they graduate but things are changing so fast in every field," he said.

"Computer systems for engineers may be outdated, for one example. Also, a marketing concept taught in the classroom may have changed or may no longer be used."

Questionnaires would be sent to recent graduates and seniors. The results would be sent back to every dean so changes could be made in the courses offered, Taylor said.

Taylor is also concerned with the lack of adequate parking. He said he would like to see a parking lot built north of Weber Hall to aid in solving the problem. Funding for the lot should come from interest gained on auxiliary enterprises, Taylor said. Lafene Student Health Center, parking fees and housing are included in auxiliary enterprises. They are self-supported by student fees and bring in about $45 million a year for the University, K-State receives none of the interest; rather, it all goes to the state, he said.

"I feel cheated," Taylor said. "I am willing to lobby to the state for our right to that money. Interest from Lafene alone would bring in an additional $200,000. The interest from parking fees could easily build a new lot."

Taylor is against the selective admissions policy proposal by the Kansas Board of Regents. The policy would force students to meet one of three requirements before being admitted to K-State, The Wichita State University and the University of Kansas. These requirements include having taken an approved college curriculum, receiving a 23 on their ACT, or having been in the top one-third of their graduating class.

"We might have to drop below 100 level courses and we can't afford to do that. Too many students need refresher courses," he said. "But I do agree with strengthening requirements."

Students' involvement primary goal of Lubbers

By Karen Allen
Collegian Reporter

Troy Lubbers, junior in business administration, will emphasize student involvement at the state level during his campaign for student body president.

Lubbers currently serves as chairman of the Board of Directors of the Associated Students of Kansas and has been involved with the lobbying organization for more than two years. He said his involvement at the state level has prepared him for the upcoming election.

"The student body president must assume the role of a diplomat. You have to be able to bring input from one level (students) and get it across to the other (Legislature)," Lubbers said. "This year is more a year of getting student input than presenting issues to students."

Lubbers said one of his goals if he is elected is increasing student input. Interacting with students at an open forum and possibly hosting a radio talk show are two ways he plans to gather student input.

In regard to the selective admissions proposal before the Kansas Board of Regents, Lubbers said student input is needed. He also pointed out students have to "face the fact" that open admissions may change, because it is "all going to be tied in" with the Margin of Excellence program.

"We don't want to find ourselves in a reactionary position," Lubbers said. "We have to look at alternatives before the decision is made. We have to ask students how they would want it (admissions policy) to change."

Lubbers supports the Margin of Excellence, a plan adopted by the Board of Regents to maintain the quality of education at the seven regents schools in Kansas through increased funding from the Legislature. Tuition may increase as a result of the plan, Lubbers said, which is an aspect he is concerned about.

"I am pushing for the Regents' plan, but do not want to see us (K-State) lose students due to a funding problem," he said.

Dear Dave:

I wanted to pass on to you the thanks from Principal Management for your petition drive to bring U2 to Manhattan. They and the band were most impressed by the support of your listeners. Unfortunately, the routing of a major tour is most complex and playing Manhattan simply couldn't work out this time.

I don't know when they plan to tour again but you and your listeners can rest assured that U2 is well aware of the tremendous support they have with the listeners of KSKT.

Debate about chiropractic effectiveness continues

By Debbie Lyons
Collegian Reporter

Ouch!

For bad backs and muscular pain, as well as heart disorders and asthma, thousands of people are going to chiropractors for treatment.

But, the debate continues among physicians and chiropractors about the effectiveness of chiropractic.

Mark Hatesohl, doctor of chiropractic, said about 80 percent of the patients who receive treatment from a chiropractor are helped somewhat, 10 percent have no change in their condition and another 10 percent get worse.

"I'm not sure we should get rid of (chiropractors)."
—Dr. Guy Smith

Dr. Guy Smith, physician of sports medicine at Lafene Student Health Center, doesn't agree.

He said people with chronic muscular complaints are "the only people (chiropractors) can help and only help a small percent of them."

Hatesohl said chiropractic is a licensed profession based on the theory that all body systems are controlled by the nervous system: the brain, the spinal cord and the nerves. The nerves branch out from the spinal cord through the bones of the spine called vertebrae.

Half of the nerves go to skeletal muscles involved in movement and the other to internal organs. Nerves to specific organs and parts of the body are contained within a specific area of the spine.

Discomfort of the muscles or disorders of the organs are caused when one of the vertebrae gets out of position and a nerve is pinched.

The chiropractor identifies the area of the spine from which the irritated nerve originates and gently pushes the misaligned vertebrae back into position, freeing the nerve and allowing it to function properly.

The conflict arises between physicians and chiropractors because physicians don't agree that the vertebrae can become out of place and then pushed back into alignment.

"True nerve compression is relatively rare," Smith said.

Nerve compression and irritation are what the whole theory of chiropractic is based on, he said.

The theory of chiropractic was derived in the 1800s when the only thing traditional medicine could do to relieve pain was use a knife and cut off the cause of the pain. This theory ignores all scientific information introduced since then, Smith said.

Chiropractic care serves "some useful function for people whom traditional medicine cannot help, but the basis (of the theory) has no fact whatsoever anymore," he said.

Chiropractors are like mechanics, Smith said. One kind of mechanic checks over the whole car and the other kind does a front end alignment no matter what the problem is. Like the second type of mechanic, the chiropractor has an answer for every patient.

"Scientific medicine is based on a specific problem being introduced, corrected and then by reintroducing that disease or bacteria, the symptoms recur," said Dr. Richard Baker, doctor of orthopedic and sports medicine. "If chiropractic is a medicine, then we should be able to stimulate the nerve and reproduce the disorder. But we can't."

"Ninety percent of the people we see with back pain have received chiropractic care. We see them when (their condition has) failed to improve," Baker said. A lot of people do seem to respond and feel better during treatment, but the recovery is not lasting, he said.

Baker said that instead of the chiropractic treatment, it's the enthusiasm with which a patient accepts treatment that affects recovery rate.

A patient must trust and have confidence in the physician, he said.

There are two kinds of patients: those who want the truth and those who want an answer, and chiropractic care gives an answer to everyone for every ailment, Smith said.

Maintaining good relations between physicians and doctors of chiropractic has been difficult, Hatesohl said.

Eleven years ago, a lawsuit was filed by four chiropractors against the American Medical Association for organizing a boycott of doctors of chiropractic with the intent of wiping out the chiropractic profession, he said.

On Aug. 27, 1987, a U.S. District Court Judge ruled that the AMA was in violation of the Sherman Antitrust laws by urging physicians to avoid all professional contact with them. The judge barred the AMA from campaigning against the chiropractic profession again.

Hatesohl said he has never had a patient referred to him by a physician.

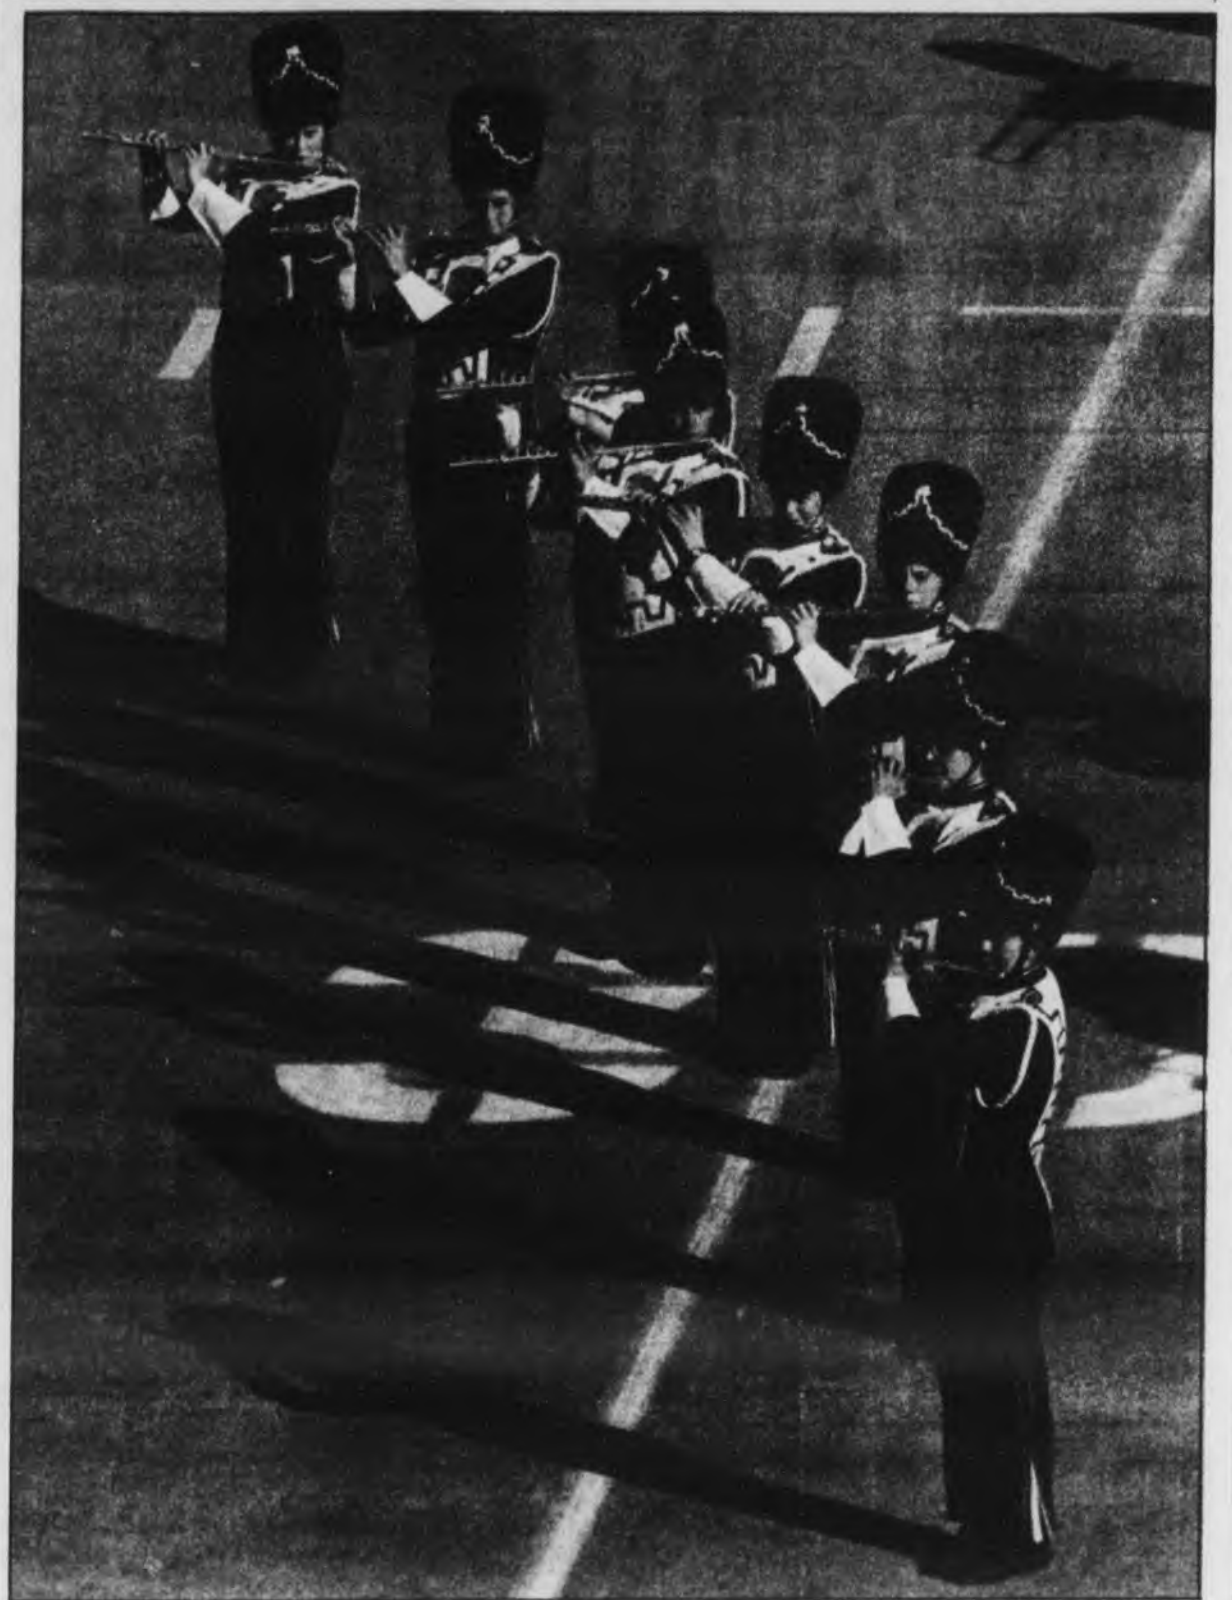

"The best I can hope for is for them (the physicians) to say it's OK to come to me for treatment," he said.

Smith said chiropractors will always exist in the United States, and so will unsatisfied people.

"I'm not sure we should get rid of them (chiropractors)," he said.

Chiropractic is a recognized form of treatment. There are chiropractors on the Board of Healing Arts, which is the licensing bureau of the medical profession, Baker said.

"Everyone has the freedom of choice," Baker said. "Chiropractic is an alternative health system."

Tour provides look at stars' murders, suicides, scandals

By The Associated Press

HOLLYWOOD — A silver hearse eased up to the curb in the shadow of the famous Mann's Chinese Theater and a man stepped out, dressed in a somber three-piece morning suit complete with gray spats and tails.

"Are you here for the 12 o'clock tour?" asked W. Miller Maurer.

"Yeah!" answered Bob Lampe and Kathy Cody, tourists from Dubuque, Iowa, grinning with enthusiasm.

The Iowans were each given a complimentary calla lily, the traditional "flower of death." They climbed into the seven-passenger hearse and Maurer and Greg Smith, the "Director of Undertakings," spirited them away on Grave Line Tours — "a lively look at the deathstyles of the rich and famous."

"The Grave Line tour will show you the house where TV's 'Superman' was felled not by Kryptonite, but by his own speeding bullet!" their brochure says. "You'll gawk at the spot where Marilyn Monroe posed for her famous nude calendar! You'll career around the corner where Montgomery Clift's near-fatal car accident wrecked his career and led to his demise."

Lampe, 30, and Cody, 29, said they learned of the tour while looking at celebrity footprints outside the Chinese theater.

Few of the places visited by Grave Line Tours are on the typical route of celebrity homes covered by competitors.

The hearse glides daily past some 75 sites throughout Los Angeles and Beverly Hills, including the Chateau Marmont Hotel, where comedian John Belushi died from a drug overdose on March 5, 1982, and the apartment building where Art Linkletter's daughter Diane leaped to her death on Oct. 4, 1969.

Also on the route is the house where TV's Superman, George Reeves, killed himself in 1959 and the site of Clift's 1957 car accident. The Brentwood home where Marilyn Monroe died in 1962 is too far afield, said Smith, who was driving.

Grave Lines' 2½-hour, $25 "per body" tour of the stars' last stops — "Hollywood's most notorious murders, suicides and scandals" — was conceived by Smith, 27.

He said that while working temporarily in a comedian's home, he was astounded at the number of tour vans that passed by, bullhorn blaring and cameras flashing.

The experience led to his first "Tour of Everlasting Embalment" earlier this month.

"Dead people didn't bother me, so I figured I should capitalize on it," Smith said. "When I told my dad my idea, he said he thought it was the ultimate in bad taste — and I knew I was onto something."

He bought the 1969 Cadillac hearse for $1,000 from a funeral home in Nebraska and had it converted for tourists.

Boston treats concert-goers to a party

By Judd Annis
Of the Collegian Staff

When I was in high school, there were several albums that always played at parties. There was AC/DC's "Back in Black," any of Van Halen's first four albums and, of course, either of the albums by Boston.

Boston's songs seemed to epitomize the mood of a generation. Their music had no enemies. If rock 'n' roll was your mind-set and partying was your objective, a Boston album on the turntable or Boston tape in the car was a given.

Formed around designer-inventor Tom Scholz, who has a master's degree in mechanical engineering from Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the band's self-titled debut LP still holds the record for the most successful first album by a group. Selling a reported nine million copies since its recording, it's no small wonder that the band and its music have remained extremely popular for almost a decade.

Concert Review

This is also evidenced by the numerous concert halls around the United States that have and will be selling out this year. Wichita's Kansas Coliseum was no exception Saturday night, as this legendary band was in town to treat the city to a party.

Saturday's show, in front of a sell-out crowd, marked the group's return after eight years without new material and at least as long since its last area concert. Brad Delp, lead vocalist and only remaining member besides lead guitarist Scholz, had this in mind when he told the crowd: "Wichita, it's been a long time."

The band took the stage with "Rock 'n' roll Band," a song from its first album and one that tells the band's life history in less than three minutes. From there, they launched into "Piece of Mind," a song written by Scholz while he was restless at his position as senior product designer for Kodak.

"It's Easy," "Don't Look Back" and "More Than a Feeling," all from the band's second album "Don't Look Back," closed out the first third of the show with a good punch, setting the mood for the band's performance of the entire third album, "Third Stage." Appropriately enough, the concert itself was split into three distinct parts, with the first and last segments containing material from the group's first two albums and the middle portion containing songs from their most recent album.

Standouts on the material taken from "Third Stage" were "We're Ready," a powerful performance of "Cool the Engines" and "Can'tcha Say/Still in Love." Admittedly, I was not thrilled with "Third Stage" when it came out because it seemingly lacked the intensity and enthusiasm of the band's previous material. But in the concert, the best-sounding songs were the tracks taken from this album.

I'm sure this can be attributed to the fact that most of "Third Stage" was recorded with the band's current lineup and not with the original founding members. Consequently, something's been lost (or gained, depending on your perspective) along the way.

The final portion of the show kicked off with a brief introduction of the band members, including a standing ovation for Scholz, who not only wrote the material that was performed throughout the night, but designed and produced the show as well. The other members of Boston are Jim Masdea on percussion, and Gary Pihl on guitars. Sammy Hagar fans will note that Pihl used to be Hagar's main axman before Hagar left for the "new" Van Halen.

The band started the third portion of the concert with "Long Time" and then went into "Feelin' Satisfied," two songs that finally succeeded in winning over those who had been sitting on their hands. The set concluded with "Used to Bad News" and "Gonna Hitch a Ride," followed by an encore of "Take You Home Tonight" and their trademark "Party."

For the most part, Boston was well received by the crowd, although many who are used to high decibels and pyrotechnics were disappointed. The volume level was noticeably low, which made this particular concert a little like eating Chinese food with a fork. I came to hear the Boston I loved to listen to at 10 decibels and, like many others there, kept waiting for someone to turn up the juice.

Unfortunately, the "juice" never came, keeping Boston's fans from having the time of their lives they should have had.

'South Pacific' seen as enchanting

By Becky Howard
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Audiences were treated to "some enchanted evening" this weekend, as tropical breezes flowed throughout McCain Auditorium with the K-State Players' production of Rodgers and Hammerstein's musical "South Pacific."

Set on two Pacific islands during World War II, this uplifting, rousing musical was portrayed with more professionalism than any recent musical production I have seen by the K-State Players.

Play Review

Under the direction of Charlotte MacFarland, instructor of speech, the show was a masterpiece, an outstanding piece of work which perfectly exemplified this classic musical made up of humor, love and tragedy conceived during the hardship of war.

The entire cast, from the frolicking chorus of flirting nurses to the ram-bunctious, fun-loving sailors, created a heat of Caribbean enthusiasm with energy and fun — they clearly seemed to enjoy being onstage.

Leading and chorus roles were all very strong, and if there was a weak link in the cast, I failed to find it.

Leading this professional cast was an excellent portrayal of Emile De Becque by Dwight Tolar, sophomore in music. Tolar, who was also cast as the lead in last year's musical, "Okla-homa," again displayed his talent as Summit may not occur in Reagan's term

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George P. Shultz indicated Sunday that if Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev continues to put obstacles in the way of an arms control agreement, a U.S.-Soviet summit might not occur in the Reagan presidency.

"We'll have it when he's ready, or, if he waits too long, maybe we won't be ready," Shultz said on NBC-TV's "Meet the Press," one day after returning from two days of talks in Moscow.

"This administration ends in January, 1989. And as you get into the heat of the election campaign, it's no time for a Soviet leader to be here," Shultz added. "So there's only a finite amount of time, only a finite amount of patience with all of this."

Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze raised the topic of a summit this fall during meetings in Washington in September, Shultz said, adding that during talks in Moscow last week, Gorbachev suggested that President Reagan visit the Soviet Union next year.

"We discussed it. Not only a summit here, but he clearly has in his mind President Reagan coming to Moscow next year, which is fine if we have something worthwhile to do," Shultz said. "But then he somehow isn't quite comfortable, he hasn't made up his mind."

Administration officials had voiced puzzlement at Gorbachev's sudden refusal Friday to fix a date for a summit, but emphasized that the decision should not block a treaty banning intermediate-range nuclear missiles.

Shultz said Sunday the administration was willing to sign a treaty with the Soviets, even without a super-power summit meeting, and he said he remains optimistic about such an agreement.

"We have basically worked out practically all the problems and our negotiators will be back," Shultz said. However, he pointed out that the Soviets "can change their minds."

But what we should do is not be thrown off by them changing their minds."

"We have to stay on our track, and when they're ready to sign, fine, we'll be there," he added.

The treaty, applying to missiles mostly based in Europe, was the projected centerpiece of the next summit meeting between Reagan and Gorbachev. The two have met face-to-face twice before — in Geneva in November, 1985 and in Reykjavik, Iceland, in October, 1986.

Frank C. Carlucci, the national security adviser who accompanied Shultz on the trip to Moscow, said Sunday Soviet leaders indicated that they would prefer to reach an arms agreement with the Reagan administration, but Gorbachev said he would be willing to wait for the next administration.

"He made the comment to the effect that, 'Well, if you don't come around to our position on this, I may have to deal with the next administration.'"

Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said it is a privilege to have a cellist of Wang's caliber play at McCain.

"The soloist was a youngster when Mr. Stern made his documentary 'From Mao to Mozart: Isaac Stern in China', and he was noticed then by Stern who said then that 'this child has great potential and will be a great cellist,'" Martin said.

Martin said China's cultural and revolutionary history may have an influence on the style and interpretation of the music. He referred to China's cultural revolution in the 1960s and '70s when virtually no symphonic music was performed because it was considered too much of a Western influence by the Communist government.

In an interview with The New York Times, Chen, the conductor, said he was training as a pianist when he was sent to work in the rice paddies. The concertmaster for the Central Philharmonic Orchestra, Yang Bingsun, was imprisoned for more than nine years.

Martin also said that China's warm relations with the Soviet Union at one time during Mao's rule may also influence the interpretation of the music.

"It's going to be interesting to hear them because of their checkered career," Martin said. "It will be interesting to hear an orchestra that does not come out of Western traditional culture."

Chinese music will not be a part of the program.

"It (the selected music) is the type of music everybody should hear live," Martin said. "People will find out a lot about Elgar during this concert."

Elgar's cello concerto to be performed Tuesday night is an autumnal work, composed near the end of his career. At that time he was experiencing a depression caused by World War I and its effect on the German people and culture. Elgar himself was British.

"It's not fluff by any means," Martin said. "It's a very major thing."

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 12 an actor, singer and all-around performer as he carried a French accent — and charm — throughout singing and dialogue in his depiction of De Becque. Tolar's rendition of "Some Enchanted Evening" was enough to send a chill down the spine of any red-blooded American female.

J.C. Harmon, senior in theater, who was cast as lead Nellie Forbush, added a sweet charm as De Becque's object of affection. Harmon gave both the innocence and strength required to exemplify this heroine who captured De Becque's — as well as the audience's — hearts.

Leading the sailors was the comic portrayal of Luther Billis by Don Pfister, senior in radio-television, who gave a wonderfully funny addition to the cast as the trouble-causing, yet somewhat simple-minded, rebellious sailor.

Also a funny compliment to the show was the native souvenir saleswoman, Bloody Mary, played by Amy Hemphill, senior in music education. Conniving and comical, Hemphill clearly represented the flavor of the tropics as she sang "Bali Hai."

Retirees should not see any drop in the benefits they are currently receiving from CREF, Sheahan said.

"For participants who are already retired," she said, "their incomes are staying the same."

They will be the same, at least, until May 1, 1988. On May 1 of each year, retirees' benefits are adjusted based on the activity of the 2000 stocks in CREF's portfolio for the 12 months ending March 31, Sheahan said.

Faculty members participate in two investment plans offered through TIAA-CREF, Gehrt said. TIAA is a pension plan invested in bonds and mortgages paying set interest rates. While the return on their investment is lower, the participants are assured they will receive the principle they have invested.

Dow Jones suffers second-largest loss

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average suffered its second-largest point loss ever Monday, falling 157 points and wiping out most gains made after last week's staggering 508-point plunge.

The selling followed a record loss on the prime Hong Kong exchange, which lost one-third of its value on the first day of trading in a week. Tokyo, London and other foreign markets also had large losses.

Investors appeared to be unmoved by deficit-reduction talks between President Reagan and congressional leaders that were called after last week's market panic.

"It's a slow fade, sinking in the sunset," said Dennis Jarrett, a technical analyst for the investment firm of Kidder, Peabody & Co.

Analysts said the market was still reeling from the history-making plunge Oct. 19, when the Dow industrials fell a record 508 points. In six days of seesaw trading, the Dow has dropped about 450 points.

The value of all U.S. stocks Monday fell $203 billion to $2.23 trillion, or 8.4 percent, a one-day evaporation of wealth exceeded only by the $503 billion drop one week earlier. The Dow average of 30 industrials fell 156.83 points to 1,793.93.

"It was a panic and it's still to some degree continuing," said Morton L. Brown Jr., research director for Edward D. Jones & Co., a St. Louis-based brokerage company that serves small investors in 38 states.

Trading volume on the New York Stock Exchange continued at a heavy pace. A total of 308.82 million shares changed hands, which made Monday the sixth busiest session on record.

The New York and American stock exchanges, the Chicago Board Options Exchange, the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the Chicago Board of Trade and the Midwest Stock Exchange announced they would close two hours early throughout the week, a policy begun late last week to cope with the heavy trading volume.

There was violence Monday when a Florida investor who reportedly suffered heavy losses in the market killed one broker and critically wounded another in their Miami brokerage office. The man then shot and killed himself, police said.

The market's decline is proving a blow for small companies that need to raise money for expansion and job creation, analysts said.

Impact on population not clear, experts say

By Deron Johnson

Although the volatile activity on Wall Street the past 10 days has had a profound impact on those who play the stock market game, its effect on the U.S. population in general is less clear.

"There's a tremendous amount of speculation," said Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics. "It's awfully hard to know for sure what the impact will be."

However, he said the impact on those who have invested money in the market is certain.

"Those people...are not able to buy that BMW and will have to settle for a Plymouth," he said.

What may have the greatest impact, Oldfather said, is that the average consumer may be frightened by the media reports.

"What's so much more speculative is the people who read all the bad news and think this is a harbinger of things to come," he said. "Human beings are complex organisms and it's hard to guess how they might respond."

James Shanteau, a professor of psychology who teaches a consumer psychology course, said consumers' anxiety over the market will likely result in decreased buying.

"One of the things we know is important in consumer behavior is the perceived

The last shoppers head home Monday shortly after 9 p.m. from the first official day of business at the Manhattan Town Center. The mall opened at 9:30 a.m. for the ribbon cutting and dedication ceremonies for the $24 million facility.

Most shoppers impressed with new mall

By Janet Swanson
Agri/Business Editor

The wait is over.

After a decade of planning, the Manhattan Town Center, in "The Heart of It All," was unveiled Monday.

Following the ribbon cutting and dedication ceremony, area residents were allowed in to view the mall for the first public viewing.

"It's just fantastic. All of the entertainment is on schedule, and everyone has been stopping by making comments on how nice the mall is," said Tracy Wells, Manhattan. Wells works at the mall's information booth.

Shoppers praised the mall's architect, RTKL of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., for its design.

"It is very impressive and very

"I've been to other mall openings and they haven't been as impressive as this," she said.

Other malls, Graham said, have had their opening after the public had been allowed in to view the building.

"The way they did it here (not having a public viewing) added to the mystery. And, more people came to the opening ceremony because of it," she said.

Although Bill Brondell, Manhattan, said he isn't a "mall person," he was among the first-day shoppers at the mall.

"It's a nice building," he said. "I'm sure my family will buy a few things here."

Despite Manhattan being considered a secondary market, Chuck Morrison, area supervisor of Regis Hairstylist, said the market is a viable one.

"Everything has been wonderful today. We have had a good turnout and expect continual growth," he said.

Pat Ball, owner of Functions in Aggieville, also hopes the mall succeeds.

"Competition is good," she said. "But it will hurt all of us in Manhattan if it doesn't succeed."

John Heritage, owner of The Sound Shop, the Lone Star Cafe and the Hibachi Hut, all in Aggieville, said despite the competition he will receive from the mall's music shop, the mall should increase business overall.

"They aren't selling any stereo equipment, and from what I understand, will concentrate on CDs and cassettes," he said.

Both Ball and Heritage agreed the mall did little to effect their businesses on Monday.

"We have had a good day — better than a normal Monday," said Heritage. "I do know that lunch was down a little, but not much. What might be hurt the most will be the clothing stores."

However, employees at Undercover and Benetton said business was normal for a Monday.

Lori Mulch, area supervisor for Seiferts, said sales at the new store were right on target.

"Things are just going excellent. I think we expect a lot more on our first day than most, but we're getting it," she said.

Provost: Recruitment of minorities merits campus-wide support

By Paula Selby
Collegian Reporter

K-State's administration has begun a four-point program to recruit more minority students and faculty to the University, but the program will not be effective unless the campus-wide attitude supports and welcomes minorities, said Provost James Coffman.

"You can't solve this kind of issue with guidelines and rules," he said. "Faculty and students have to make a conscious effort to have an environment at K-State that is self-evident in its welcome to minorities."

The administration appointed Charles I. Rankin, professor of education, as a consultant to the program. He will assist Coffman and Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, in trying to accomplish the following four major goals.

■ Increase student enrollment with an emphasis on minority students.

■ Increase recruitment of black faculty.

■ Set up a network of contacts at ethnically diverse colleges to attract black, Hispanic and American Indian students to K-State's graduate and post-doctoral programs.

■ Increase graduate funds and scholarships through private and government sources.

"During the last four or five months, allegations have been presented saying that K-State is not a favorable environment for minorities," Rankin said.

"We (the administration) are collectively watching for opportunities to facilitate recruitment. If you really stay alert...there are instances where, with a little extra effort and support, you can put an arrangement together that facilitates a minority appointment," Coffman said.

The deans of the colleges and the Minority Resource Center have been working to increase minorities on campus, Coffman said, "so it isn't a matter of starting from scratch. It's a matter of trying to augment and coordinate efforts."

Rankin, a native of Kansas, has been at K-State for nine years and said he thinks he knows the University.

"I don't think Kansans operate under the concept of racism. I think Kansans tend to operate under the Decency supporters protest 'motel porn'

By Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

Members of the local chapter of the National Federation for Decency picketed outside the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome Monday protesting movies on the hotel's pay TV system which the group says are pornographic.

"We're local citizens concerned with what's being shown in our community," said Mark Roberts, president of the organization.

Manhattan Holiday Inn management disagrees with NFD's description of the films the hotel rents to its guests, said John Peterson, associate general manager.

"We've talked with the group," Peterson said, "We've never been able to bridge the gap where we say the movies are R-rated and they say the movies are pornographic."

Peterson said all of the movies protested by the group have an R rating by the Motion Picture Association of America and are shown only after 8:30 p.m.

A guest who wishes to watch the films must have a combination to receive the films on the TV set in their room. Each viewing of a movie through the hotel costs $5.99, Peterson said.

Peterson also said parents who have children staying with them in the hotel can have the channel turned off in their room.

"We felt the MPAA standards would reflect those of our society," Peterson said.

Roberts said members of the Manhattan group had come to the hotel and watched some of the films being offered through the service.

"The movies are not those you'll ever see in a family neighborhood theater," Roberts said.

Roberts described the movies being shown by the hotel as "anti-

Kansas awarded federal grant

TOPEKA — The state has received a $500,000 federal grant to be used to help public school districts and private schools to inspect and manage asbestos in their buildings, Gov. Mike Hayden's office announced Monday.

Kansas was one of 12 states to receive a grant from the federal Environmental Protection Agency, and it was the only state to receive maximum amount of financing available, Hayden's office said. The grant will be administered through the State Board of Education.

Under federal law, both public and private schools must conduct inspections and do periodic monitoring of asbestos in their buildings, and they must complete plans to manage asbestos by October 1988. Asbestos has been linked to a lung disorder.

Dead woman's remains found

ABILENE — Dickinson County authorities were investigating the death of woman whose skeletal remains were found in a pasture northwest of Abilene during the weekend.

Sheriff Carl McDonald said Monday that he was awaiting word from Michael Finnegan, a forensic anthropologist at Kansas State University, who indicated the bones appeared to be those of a black woman. Officials had not determined her identity or how or when she died.

McDonald said authorities were quite sure the death was not accidental.

The body was found Saturday morning by Jeff Collie, who lives nearby and was hunting about a mile north of Interstate 70.

Man charged with girl's death

OTTAWA — An Ottawa man was charged in Franklin County District Court Monday in connection with the death of his 2-year-old stepdaughter.

Dale Lee Greenfield, 26, who in recent years has used the alias Jesse D. Wolfe, was charged by Franklin County Attorney Wendell Barker with first-degree murder, aggravated sodomy and child abuse. Bond was set at $150,000 and a preliminary hearing was scheduled for Nov. 3.

Greenfield's stepdaughter, Nicole J. Robinson, died Saturday at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan., where she was taken late last Thursday afternoon.

Franklin County sheriff's officials listed the cause of death as "blunt trauma." The girl suffered multiple injuries, including severe head injuries.

Teen-ager poisons parents

MILWAUKEE — A teen-ager was being held in juvenile custody Monday after her parents detected poison in their coffee, authorities said.

The 14-year-old girl, who had argued Saturday night against a curfew, made coffee Sunday and later admitted to her parents that she had mixed a cleansing substance in coffee granules, the police report said.

The report said the parents spit out the coffee because it caused a burning sensation, and that an investigation determined it had been laced with lye. The parents were not injured, officers said.

T-bills' interest rate plunges

WASHINGTON — Interest rates on short-term Treasury securities fell sharply in Monday's auction with rates on three-month bills dropping to the lowest level in a year.

The Treasury Department sold $6.4 billion in three-month bills at an average discount rate of 5.12 percent, down from 6.84 percent last week. Another $6.4 billion was sold in six-month bills at an average discount rate of 5.98 percent, down from 7.21 percent last week.

The rates were the lowest since three-month bills sold for 5.08 percent on Oct. 6, 1986, and six-month bills averaged 5.54 percent last July 13.

Six inmates on food strike

LANSING — Six inmates at the Kansas State Penitentiary were refusing food Monday to call attention to various personal demands, administrator Jerry Judy said.

Nine inmates took part in a hunger strike for up to five days earlier this month, and Judy said two of them were among the six engaged in the new protest.

As in the previous protest, there was no common complaint from the prisoners, but most wanted to be transferred to facilities in other states, Judy said.

Plans for summit look bleak

WASHINGTON — President Reagan indicated Monday he has no interest in a battle of wits with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev over whether Gorbachev will accept an invitation to a summit in the United States this year.

At the same time, presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said U.S. officials are perplexed by Gorbachev's refusal to set a date for a summit which both sides have contemplated to consummate a treaty to eliminate intermediate-range nuclear weapons.

During a picture-taking session with congressional leaders, Reagan was asked if he thought Gorbachev was trying to play mind games with him on the issue of superpower summitry. "If he is, he's playing solitaire," the president replied.

Hunter to be tried in Hays

TOPEKA — The Kansas Supreme Court Monday ordered that James C. Hunter, charged with murder in connection with a 1985 shooting spree that left four dead in northwest Kansas, be tried in Hays.

Thomas County District Judge Keith R. Willoughby of Colby granted a change of venue Oct. 9 and asked that the state's high court designate a location for Hunter's second trial. The Kansas Supreme Court ordered a new trial in July for Hunter, 35, of Amoret, Mo., one of three people serving a life sentence in connection with the shooting spree.

The new trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 11.

The Kansas Supreme Court ordered the second trial for Hunter on the grounds that Willoughby should have instructed the jury on a defense of compulsion.

Thomas County Attorney Perry Murray did not object to the change of venue motion, made after the state Supreme Court overturned the conviction, because the first trial was carried by television in the Colby area.

Hunter contended in his appeal that he was forced to go along on the shooting spree by Daniel Remeta, 29, of Traverse City, Mich.

Wall Street's Roller Coaster

Staff/Steve Wolgast

U.S. Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., discusses with Faye and Owen R. Jones the historical registering of 100-year-old farms in Kansas. Slattery spoke to the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce during a breakfast Monday.

Reaction to market crisis important, Slattery says

By Brenda Badostain
Collegian Reporter

The reaction of the U.S. government to recent events on Wall Street is important to the economic future of the country, Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., said Monday morning at the University Inn.

Slattery was speaking as part of the "Eggs and Issues" series sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

"I think this may very well be a very important week in the history of this country," he said.

He stressed the importance of the president and Congress coming together on an agreement to "bring about a significant deficit reduction."

"When I say significant, I'm talking at least $23 billion," Slattery said. "Candidly, I would like to see us reach a level that would assure us of more progress in deficit reduction next year, over the last year."

According to President Reagan's figures, Slattery said, the deficit last year was down from about $220 billion to $148 billion. He said this progress needs to continue in order to reduce the deficit even more.

Slattery said this can be done because of "the level of unemployment in the country and given the underlying stability of the economy."

"I think that now is the time for (Congress) to do some things that will net us...the kind of structural changes that are needed to really achieve real long-term deficit reduction," Slattery said.

A reduction in the deficit will occur, he said, only if the president is willing to discuss all economic issues.

"As far as I'm concerned, when we go to the economic summit I want everything on the table. I'm willing to talk about everything in the entire federal budget," he said.

Slattery said a new attitude exists among people he has talked to regarding the deficit.

"I'm convinced that for the first time in several years there's an attitude... (that) this is serious business," he said. "We're facing a very important challenge, but...we're facing it with a new attitude."

Slattery said the Wall Street crash last week prompted the new attitude.

"And it often times takes a shock — something that gets people's attention and builds the political consensus — that's needed to force people together," he said, adding that the American public will respond in a positive way and "make the tough choices that have to be made to achieve that objective."

Several factors came together last week to cause the stock market turmoil, Slattery said.

"I think the market was due for a correction," he said. "In addition to that, I think there is just growing concern about the trade deficit — the fiscal policy of the country, uneasiness in the financial community about the value of the dollar and what interest rates were going to do in this country."

Computerized trading also may have contributed to the recent problems, Slattery said.

Investor kills broker Incident linked to losses

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — An investor who had suffered heavy stock market losses shot and killed a brokerage manager and seriously wounded his personal broker in their offices Monday, then turned his gun on himself, police and witnesses said.

The gunman, Arthur Kane, 53, of Miami, was dead at the scene, said Metro-Dade Police Cmdr. William Johnson. Kane was known as a regular customer.

"He had suffered some very serious losses in the stock market. He was distraught," said Marvin Hollub, father-in-law of the oldest of Kane's three daughters.

A Merrill Lynch spokesman said the slain brokerage manager was Jose F. Argilagos, 51. The wounded stockbroker was Lloyd Kolokoff, 39, of Miami. Both were local vice presidents.

Kolokoff was in serious condition at Baptist Hospital late Monday after surgery to remove bullet fragments, said hospital spokeswoman Adrienne Silver. He had a gunshot wound to the back and suffered injury to a lung and the spinal cord, she said.

Johnson said it's possible there were no other witnesses to the shooting at the Merrill Lynch office near The Falls shopping center in southwest Dade County.

"They met in Argilagos's office," said homicide investigator Russell Fischer. "During the course of their discussion, Mr. Kane pulled a handgun out of his briefcase. ... a number of shots were fired."

Fischer described the weapon as a .357-caliber, six-shot handgun.

In Kane's suburban Kendall neighborhood, family and friends gathered at the contemporary-style house on a pine-shaded cul-de-sac. Hollub spoke briefly with reporters, but gave few details about Kane.

Police said Kane was a Social Security hearing examiner for the federal government. Merrill Lynch employees said he visited their office nearly every day.

Aaron Perry, a broker with Profile Investments, said friends at Merrill Lynch told him Kane was a longtime customer who had received a margin call because of last week's decline.

"From what I've heard, the guy was overextended. We're talking huge losses," said Perry.

"He was just a regular customer. He always seemed calm and collected," said broker Osvaldo Machado, 36.

Machado's wife, Olga, a 28-year-old junior assistant at the company, said Kane would stop and chat with many employees and was in the office often.

Melvyn Cohen, a Merrill Lynch vice president, said Kane was a regular customer but calling him a heavy trader was "speculation right now."

People who buy stock on margin use money borrowed from a brokerage to cover up to half the cost of securities. If the value of a stock falls, a brokerage issues what is known as a margin call, asking the client to put up more assets to cover the falling value of the stock.

If the call is not met, the brokerage can sell the stock to cover the debt.

Argilagos had worked with Merrill Lynch since 1961, coming to Miami from Puerto Rico in 1977. Kolokoff was hired in Miami in 1975, the company said.

Bruce Anderson, the manager of a nearby furniture store who spoke to brokers leaving the office, said he was told that the gunman had indicated he had a check with him before he walked into Argilagos's office.

Several customers stood outside police lines until an employee came out and informed them that they should return Tuesday.

Police began letting brokers back into their offices about 40 minutes after the shooting.

Past Aggie disturbances justify harsh measures

A drastic solution for the immature.

That describes the plans now being set into motion to prevent another riotous disturbance in Aggieville on Nov. 7, the date of the annual meeting of the K-State and University of Kansas football teams.

The plan is drastic because it is a solution more akin to confining and controlling animals in a zoo. Consider:

■ Aggieville streets will be closed at 6 a.m. the day of the game.

■ Approximately 10-foot-tall snow fences will be placed at strategic entrances into Aggieville to prevent pedestrian and vehicular traffic from getting in.

■ Five gates will be used to allow people in and out of the district.

■ Those under 17 wishing to enter Aggieville after 7 p.m. must be accompanied by a parent or legal guardian.

■ In addition to the Riley County Police Department, law enforcement officials from Pottawatomie County, Wamego, Junction City, Wichita, K-State, KU and the Kansas Highway Patrol will be enlisted to help control the crowd.

Sounds like a real fun place to party, huh?

Surely some students who resent the precautions will ostracize local authorities for taking them. However, as drastic as the plan may be, it is hardly inappropriate. Something of this magnitude had to be done in order to prevent another disturbance like last year's and the one in 1984.

Perhaps the stark realism of seeing Aggieville resemble a police state will hit home to the ugly few who prompted the violence in the past.

And it is because of those ugly few who did tremendous property and human damage that the plan had to be considered at all. The majority of the people in Aggieville those two nights in 1984 and '86 were in control.

There's no reason whatsoever why the entire crowd couldn't have remained that way, and those who disagree with that are unrealistic.

In other cities, crowds of similar size or even some much larger can congregate in the streets and have a good time without resorting to throwing bottles, burning cars or lobbing tear gas bombs. The Westport district in Kansas City, Mo., is a good example.

People there party in the streets regularly and they don't end up in the headlines the next morning. Nor do they have to navigate snow fences or contend with hundreds of police officers imported from surrounding communities.

The last two Aggieville disturbances have not been the reality. They have been the outlet for the immature who are compelled to destroy.

And for those people: The Nov. 7 Aggieville is for you.

Look at academics, not University shrubs

Put a stop payment on the checks, Uncle Jon. Come to find out, the main reason students choose a university is not the quality of education it offers, but how good the campus looks.

According to a recent study by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, the No. 1 reason people choose to attend a school is the appearance of its campus.

If this is the case, we should reallocate our funds. Trash the Margin of Excellence Plan. This is not the carrot we should be dangling in front of prospective students. We should divert funds into grounds improvement.

First, we need a mammoth fountain in Anderson Hall. Name it after a well-off alumnus or alumna. This could even be a money-making gig. Put up a "Wishing Well" sign, then every month force a couple of students on academic probation to don diving masks and collect the coins with their teeth.

Next we need a rain forest, like the one at the Topeka Zoo. The dense forest by the president's home should suffice.

Surround it with glass, turn up the humidity and stock it with some of those talking birds that look like they're wearing ugly Hawaiian shirts. Heck, though they are not really tropical, a few Koala bears couldn't hurt. Or maybe we could just put some of the squirrels we already have in there, and dupe people into believing they are Koala bears.

Prospective student: "That don't look like no Koala bear to me. Looks like a squirrel!"

Tour guide: "Ha, that shows what you know, you dimwit. Every year during Koala bear season, their coats turn red and they take diet pills to lose weight, in hopes the hunters will mistake them for squirrels."

It is sad to think of the things we could have done to improve our looks rather than squander our money on education. Everybody knows an academically sound institution can't hold a candle to a good-looking university, no matter how superficial it may be.

Sure, K-State is wielding the machete through frontiers of all kinds of engineering, genetic research and a whole bunch of other academic stuff. But if you bog down prospective students with the school stuff, they might get the idea of getting something in return for their time and money.

All that is needed is a nice campus to attract students. How could administrators think otherwise?

Then maybe we can attract the kind of students we should have — students who come here not for academic reasons, but because they really "like the lighting in the Union."

AIDS has found Kansas

Education: Key to saving lives

Walk by any bookstore or newsstand and all the magazines have an AIDS-related story. Pick up a newspaper and what do you see? Another article with the same four-letter word somewhere in a headline, usually in boldface type. Even at home you can't get away from the disease, with the constant nagging reports on television news or talk shows. By now, any mention of acquired immune deficiency syndrome will probably be ignored, treated as just another case of public paranoia. This is Kansas, and we are in the Midwest — not the East or West Coast, where AIDS is really a threat.

Wrong. You may be sick of hearing about it, but AIDS patients exist in Kansas, and the disease isn't going away. At the moment, with medical research falling short of an effective antidote, we must accept AIDS as a threat which isn't going to be leaving us soon. It isn't a temporary malady which affects only certain categories of people. AIDS — as the TV commercial says — doesn't discriminate. As many people are beginning to find out, AIDS is here to stay.

Consider the following figures:
■ From 1981, when the AIDS virus was first identified in this country, until July 6 of this year, 38,160 cases were reported to the Centers for Disease Control. More than 21,000 of these people have already died, and many are still dying. In Kansas, there have been 79 reported cases within that same period of time. Forty-eight of these people have died.

■ Of all the cases reported to the CDC, approximately 68 percent of those struck by the virus are between 30 and 49 years of age. About 82 percent of all AIDS patients are either bisexual or homosexual men, or intravenous drug users. Another 8 percent accounts for homosexuals who are also IV drug users. That leaves us with 10 percent of reported AIDS patients who comprise a wide group: from children of AIDS patients to blood transfusion receivers to ordinary,

AIDS is not, as many people like to think of it, strictly a disease afflicting only homosexuals. Although it is more prevalent among homosexual or bisexual men, it is equally as threatening to heterosexual men and women. Many heterosexuals may even carry the virus without knowing it, oblivious that they may be transmitting it to their partner or partners. Does this smell of paranoia? If so, it is only because you are not well enough acquainted with the facts.

Can casual contact with AIDS patients or persons infected with the virus place one at risk of contracting the illness? Is there danger of acquiring AIDS from donating blood? Can AIDS be transmitted by insects or domestic animals? Have there been any known cases of AIDS being transmitted through tears or saliva? Can you get AIDS from public toilets, drinking fountains, telephones or public transportation?

If you answered "yes" to any of the above questions, you are only one of millions of Americans who are sadly uninformed about the AIDS virus. Prevention of contamination will never be achieved if the public is not sufficiently educated about the disease. It is fine to hope for a miracle cure, but until it shows up, we must concentrate on learning how to avoid the AIDS virus.

For starters, AIDS is spread mainly in three ways: sexual contact, needle sharing or, less commonly, through transfusion of contaminated blood or its components. Infected mothers can also transmit the virus to their infants before, during or shortly after birth, although that constitutes a small percentage of all cases. Fears of contracting the disease through casual contact with infected people are completely unfounded and only lead to needless hysteria.

In a college community such as ours, as everyone is probably tired of hearing, safe sex can be the key to remaining AIDS-free. Having sex with multiple partners or with people who have had multiple partners is risky. The use of condoms and the abstinence from any practices which may result in injured body tissue (anal intercourse, for example) are also highly encouraged. Finally, intravenous drugs should be avoided, but if that is not the case, don't share needles or syringes with anybody.

The above recommendations cover only the tip of the proverbial iceberg. There is much yet to be learned which could help save your life and curb the spread of the disease. Education must be stressed when we speak of AIDS. Knowledge of the disease can prevent hysteria and paranoia which have no purpose other than to make the situation worse, further stigmatizing those who have fallen victim to it.

Currently, a group known as the Committee on Communicable Diseases is working toward educating the entire campus — faculty, staff and students alike — on the AIDS issue. The subcommittee especially dedicated to educating K-State students is in need of student trainees to help disseminate information to various student groups. If you are interested in learning more about AIDS or how you may be able to educate our campus on the subject, contact Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, at Holton Hall.

Information for this column was compiled from U.S. Department of Health and Human Services statistics, Public Health Service pamphlets, CDC weekly reports and monthly reports from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, Bureau of Disease Prevention and Control.

Seba out of line

Editor,
Re: Erwin Seba's "Empty generation defies expectation."

Mr. Seba, you are way out of line. Never have I heard such a pointless and unprovoked attack against a man who is doing the true work of God with the purest of hearts.

Perhaps what Mr. Seba fails to realize is that it doesn't matter if you make $49,500 annually or more. If you don't have Christ in your life, all Sam Walton's money won't satisfy your needs. You will still be poor, wretched and "empty," for a heart without Christ is truly empty.

This is the message of hope that Luis Palau proclaimed to Manhattan at his lectures. Christ himself said: "Do not be anxious, saying 'What shall we eat?' or 'What shall we drink?' or 'What shall we wear?' For the Gentiles seek these things; and your heavenly Father knows that you need them all. But seek first his kingdom and his righteousness and all these things shall be yours as well." (Matthew 6:31-33). He is saying that worldly needs are unimportant; he knows what you need and will supply it, but you must seek him first.

This is the anointing to which Palau is called. Perhaps you were disappointed that Palau didn't call for the community to rally behind the homeless, or suggest some political action. But that is not his calling. Palau is an evangelist; one who follows the Great Commission, "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations..." (Matthew 28:19); one whose call is to win souls for Christ. Such community actions are the job of pastors, not evangelists. But the first thing required for such an action by the Christian community is unity. And here the crusade effort was a glowing success. Palau's team succeeded in uniting the churches of this town like never before. Perhaps if Seba knew how much "behind the scenes" activity went on, he would be a little less judgmental. The work of this crusade has just begun.

Seba, you call yourself a Christian. But how can anyone claiming to follow Christ scoff so blatantly at the highest calling of the church? To claim that the right response to the invitation to salvation was to "leave early" is inexcusable! The first thing you must do to receive help from God is to come to Him. That is what that invitation is all about. You should hang your head in shame!

Perhaps Seba doesn't think that people who make $49,500 a year need anything from God. But that's not the way God, or I, see it.

No hard feelings

Editor:
I would like to commend every student who has taken the time and interest to join the new student athletic group, I Contributed A Twenty (ICAT). While there is no question that the approaching basketball season and the opportunity for preferred seating helped the numbers swell to well over 800 members over the last several weeks, it should also be recognized that almost half of these people joined the organization before the upcoming basketball season.

Unfortunately, amidst all the new-found enthusiasm and the building momentum of the approaching basketball season, a few individuals have managed to sour the recent successes with some rather pretentious remarks.

It was known from the very beginning that students who joined ICAT would have access to preferred seating at various sporting events. The reasoning is simple, ICAT is an organization which raises money and requires an incentive for people to join. While the incentive became much more noticeable during recent weeks, that still does not make it unfair — it just demonstrates the success of the program. And for those who wish to reduce it to nothing more than paying $55 for a basketball ticket, fine. They're better seats, maybe they should cost more.

I would also like to suggest that for most students attending this University, the decision whether or not to join ICAT was based on personal priorities instead of financial limitations.

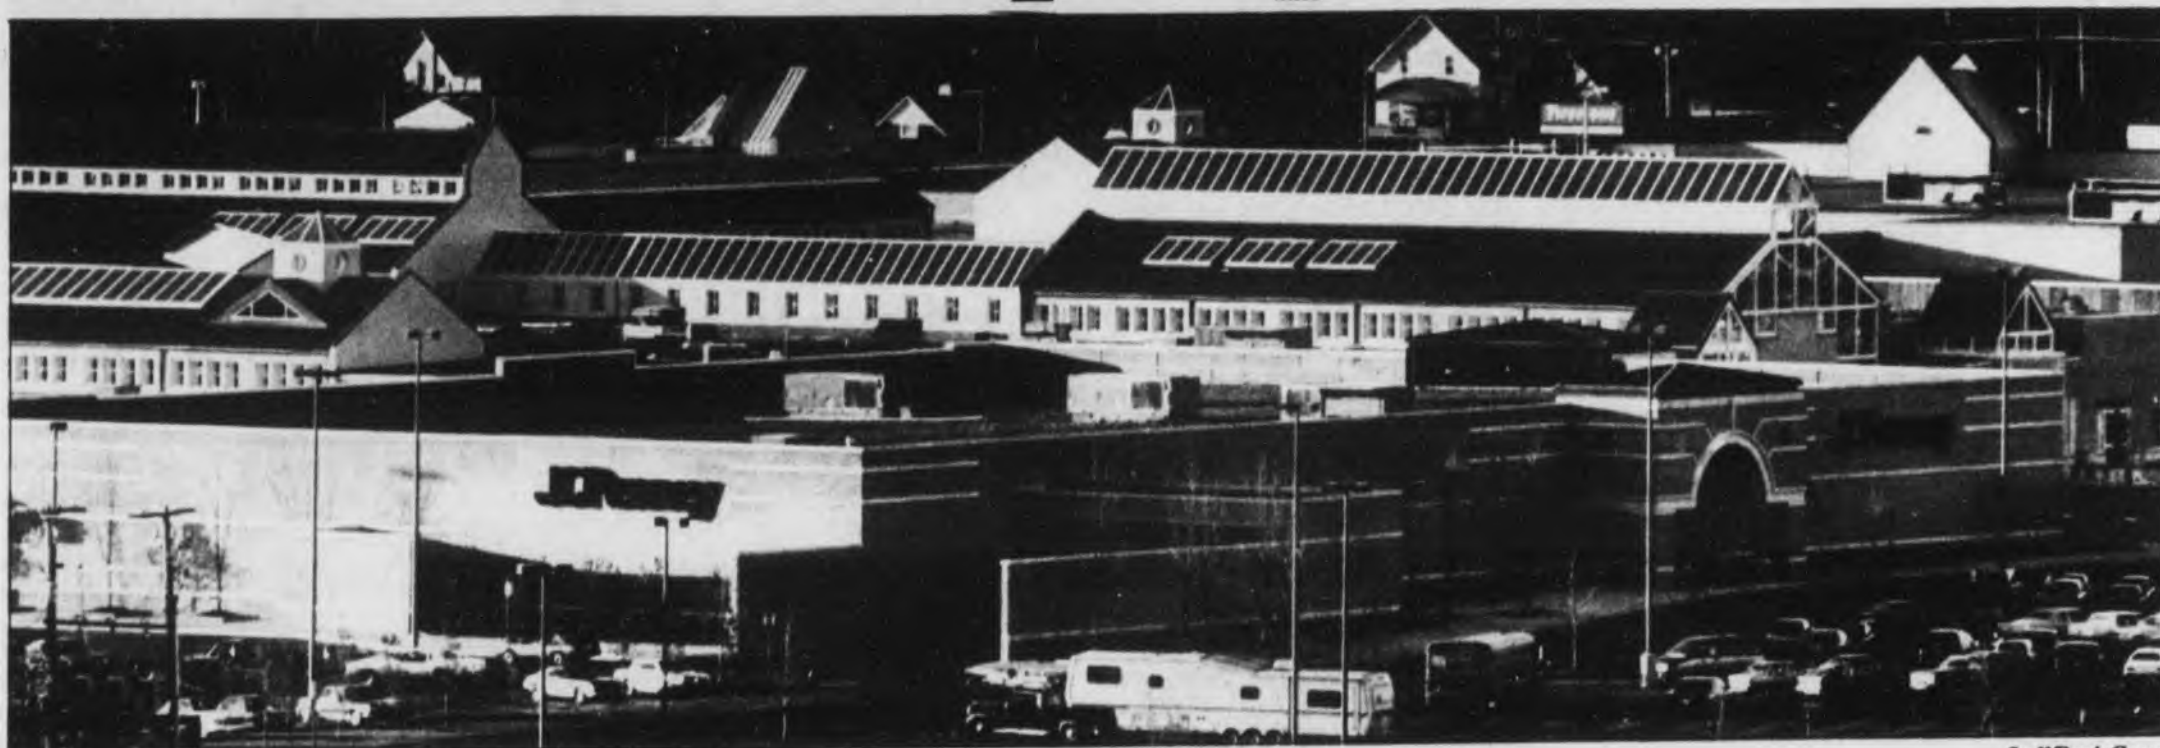

The purpose of this letter is not to generate rivalries and hard feelings among the students at K-State. I just wanted to point out that we all have a great deal for which to be proud. All students, ICAT as well as "I Saved A Twenty," need not be taking stabs at each other. Nothing good can come of this.

Town Center's shops open for business

Staff/Brad Camp

The Manhattan Town Center, which opened Monday, sits on 38 acres in the downtown area. Developers plan on the mall attracting regional trade.

Moves create empty retail spaces

By Jackie Wendt
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan Town Center's opening Monday not only increased Manhattan's shopping area, but it also created some empty store fronts in the downtown area from stores that relocated at the mall.

Roger Sink, realtor at Sink, Gillmore and Gorden Public Accountants, said the fate of the former JCPenney store is currently undecided.

"We've had nothing at this point on who's going to move into the old Penney's store, but it is for lease or sale," Sink said. "No one is committed yet."

Kathy Cornwell, manager of Brass Buckle, said some people are looking at the former Brass Buckle site, but so far, no one has made a commitment.

Seiferts, Brass Buckle for Guys &

Gals, Scot's LTD, Maurices, Braun's Fashions, Burke's Shoes, JCPenney and a branch office of Fireside Realty have all opened new stores in the mall. Among them, only Seiferts, Maurices and Burke's Shoes have decided to keep their old stores open.

Seiferts is opening a sister store in its former location.

"In order to expand as a company, we'll be bringing in Seiferts Plus, which handles sizes 14 to 26," said Maria Dwerlkotte, assistant manager at Seiferts. "Of course, the move will be expensive, but it will be worth it because that's where all the people will be."

Kelli Porter, manager of Braun's Fashions said she did not know who was going to move into the store's old location.

One reason Braun's is moving is because there aren't enough stores downtown to pull customers in, Porter said.

"Everything after 6:30 p.m. closes, and there's just not enough to get people down here and from surrounding areas," she said.

Doug Van Westen, manager of JCPenney, agreed moving to the mall would increase the buying market.

"I think the mall is just a wonderful place," Cornwell said. "With many people in one area, you can have great shopping. It's a super place."

Porter also said employees, students from the merchandising department at K-State, friends and others will be helping the store make the move to the mall.

Roxanne Blumer, manager of Scot's LTD, said the store is moving to the mall to remain competitive.

"The main competition will be there, so we need to be there," Blumer said. "Dillard's will also pull in a lot of people."

"We're really not moving out," said Jerry Hedinger, manager of Burke's Shoes. "Basically, both stores will be the same. The rent will be definitely higher at the mall, but there will be no difference in our merchandise's costs which is what a lot of people may think."

Melody Anderson, manager of Maurices, said the new Maurices store will cater to junior sizes more than the old store did.

Pat Cashin, Fireside Realty, said the new Fireside Realty office will be a kiosk.

"A kiosk is a showcase of the houses we have for sale," Cashin said. "Our business will stay here, but the showcase is strictly for advertising. We're a Better Homes & Gardens franchise and Better Homes & Gardens thinks this will be successful."

Mall

Seiferts relocated its store from downtown Manhattan to the mall. Heritage said he had considered opening a store in the mall, but the move was too risky for him to take at the time.

"It (the mall) has very good potential. If I had not just expanded and added the Lone Star, I would have considered it more. But, right now I can't afford it. It's just too big of a gamble to take," he said.

Despite his support of the smaller retailers, Heritage doesn't feel the same about the chain stores in the mall.

"The thing about Dillard's and JCPenney is that 100 percent of the profit leaves Manhattan. Now about 90 percent of it stays here from the local stores," he said.

"It (the mall) adds a lot of job opportunities in the area," said Wells.

The mall is expected to employ 600 when it reaches peak capacity.

Mall's gala allows K-State groups to work with council, developers

By Brett Hacker
Collegian Reporter

K-State organizations played active roles in festivities surrounding the opening of Manhattan's Town Center.

In addition to working with the Manhattan Arts Council in a benefit gala celebrating the grand opening of the mall Sunday night, individuals also assisted developers Monday at the ribbon-cutting ceremony.

The council approached the Department of Music for help with the entertainment for the gala, said Jack Flower, head of the Department of Music. Although the groups were not paid for their performances, the council partially funds music events throughout the year.

The department supplied a large portion of the entertainment for the gala, Flower said.

Ensembles were provided for the three stages from 6 to 8 p.m., said David Littrell, assistant professor of music.

"It (the atmosphere) just didn't seem like the Manhattan I knew growing up here," Littrell said. "I think the mall is a wonderful addition to the city. I was always in favor of the mall being built, although my parents were opposed to it. But, I think they will turn around."

Said Flower: "The Department of Music has had a great deal of cooperation over the years from the Manhattan Arts Council. This was our way of repaying them and maintaining good relations, as well as showing that we are a part of the community and that the mall project is important to us."

Tickets for the black-tie optional event were $35 per person.

Time Line

1968 — Manhattan Land Use Plan was adopted by the City Commission. The plan states the commercial development needs of Manhattan will be met by maintaining the Central Business District as a regional shopping center and sets the policy as such.

1971, 1972, 1976 — Requests for rezoning the southwest sector of the city for a shopping center were denied based on the 1968 Land Use Plan.

1976 — The Downtown Redevelopment Committee was formed to facilitate downtown improvements.

1977 — Another rezoning request for the southwest sector was denied, but the Urban Area Planning Board also indicated that improvements would have to be initiated downtown to support further denials.

1978 — Briscoe, Maphis, Murray, Lamont Inc., Boulder, Colo., was hired by the City Commission to evaluate the potential of the downtown area continuing as a regional trade center.

1979 — Briscoe, Maphis, Murray, Lamont Inc. decided Manhattan had two alternatives: maintain the downtown as a center or develop sites outside of downtown.

City commissioners requested proposals from developers for a downtown redevelopment project. Forest City Development Co., a subsidiary of Forest City Enterprises, Cleveland, Ohio, was selected.

1980 — Preliminary plans for the project included the construction of a 400,000-square-foot shopping mall in the 100-200 blocks of Poyntz Avenue.

1981 — The city submitted an application for an Urban Development Action Grant for assistance in the development of a 400,000-square-foot regional shopping mall.

The City Commission approved a Resolution of Intent to establish Tax Increment Financing for the mall.

1982 — The City Commission approved changes to the Manhattan Sign Ordinance to complement storefront improvements.

A group of businesses in redevelopment areas formed the Downtown Business Persons Organization.

1983 — The city received a $9 million UDAG grant for land acquisition.

1985 — The purchase and relocation of the businesses and residences within the 74 parcels in the area began.

1986 — Construction of the mall structure began.

1987 — The Manhattan Town Center was opened on Oct. 25 for a preview and gala event. The mall officially opened Oct. 26 with a ribbon-cutting ceremony and dedication.

Market crash 'shock with silver lining'

By Jennifer Dorsch
Staff Writer

TOPEKA — The result of the stock market crash on Oct. 19 was a shock with a silver lining, said U.S. Rep. Dan Rostenkowski D-Ill. The crash woke up President Ronald Reagan and forced him to call for an evaluation of his policies and new negotiations with Congress, he said.

Speaking to more than 400 people Monday at the Kansas Expocentre as part of the Topeka Community Financial Series, Rostenkowski criticized Reagan's lack of leadership and called for a joint effort of Congress and the White House to solve the problems of a huge national deficit and international trade imbalance. Even though Reagan's campaign

Rostenkowski denounces Reagan

"Facing the hard fact requires leadership, and that's been in short supply lately. Tax reform in this administration will probably go down as a hallmark. Greatness comes in the fact that you can admit you need a change in policy."

increase, previously not even considered an option by Reagan, Rostenkowski said. "Tax reform in this administration will probably go down as a hallmark. Greatness comes in the fact that you can admit you need a change in policy."

"The people want leadership, when Reagan puts his feet on the ground in the morning, he needs to say 'By gosh, we're going to solve a problem (that's) in the best interest of the people.'"

"Americans have been told they can have it all, and they want it. But it isn't morning in America, it's mid-day and we're waking up with a financial hangover," he said.

Rostenkowski said the proposal before Congress to reduce the deficit by $23 billion as required by the Gramm-Rudman law is the first time Congress has taken a genuine step in reducing the deficit. As chairman of the House Ways and Means committee, he said he realized Congress would never succeed in reducing the federal deficit without the Gramm-Rudman guillotine.

However, he called the proposal a "patchwork of a bill" because the minority Republicans didn't participate in forming it. He said the effort of facing the federal budget deficit needs to be a bipartisan one, stating when the administration and the Congress have worked together, the country has moved forward.

The international trade imbalance is another pressing issue facing the Congress. Rostenkowski called for negotiating a trade bill that will open foreign markets. "The ingenuity of the American people is such that in the future, the (trade) balance will change. If we can get into their markets, we'll get a balance of trade," he said.

He said an initial legislation which included trade quotas would be harmful to the competitiveness of the U.S. markets in the long run.

First lady's mother dies of stroke

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Edith Luckett Davis, the mother of first lady Nancy Reagan, died of a stroke Monday at her home in Phoenix, Ariz., the White House announced Monday. She was 91.

Davis, a onetime actress who was the widow of Chicago neurosurgeon Loyal Davis, had been ailing for several years.

The White House said she died at of a cerebral thrombosis, a blood clot in the brain and a form of stroke.

President Reagan was told first about Davis' death by Nancy Reagan's press secretary, Elaine Crispin, as he concluded an interview. He immediately went to the residence to inform his wife and remained with her the rest of the afternoon.

Nancy Reagan, who underwent breast cancer surgery Oct. 17 and returned to the White House last Thursday, was described by Crispin as "very upset."

"She's going through some old photographs of her mother. (She's) very teary," Crispin said.

Davis had been ill for some time and had round-the-clock medical care at her condominium. "She died peacefully in her sleep," Crispin said.

Tom Chauncey, a family friend who visited Davis several times a week, was at her home when she died. He informed Crispin, who said she told the president because she thought he "should be the one to be with her."

Nancy Reagan last saw her mother Aug. 13 before joining her husband at their ranch for a summer vacation. Nancy Reagan visited with her mother, who has been confined to a wheel chair for several years, a number of times a year.

The first lady "called nightly. She checked on her every day and if her mother was asleep she talked to the girls who cared for her," Crispin said.

President Reagan and the first lady will travel to Phoenix on Tuesday. Reagan will return to Washington on Tuesday evening while the first lady remained in Arizona. The president "will return to Phoenix at the end of the week when funeral arrangements are complete," the statement said.

Davis had lived in Phoenix since 1963, where she retired with her husband. The couple moved to the southwest when Loyal Davis retired as head of the surgery department at Northwestern University.

Loyal Davis died in August 1982 of congestive heart failure at age 86.

Edith Davis, often known by her nickname of "Lucky," was the ninth and last child of Sarah Whitlock and Charles Edward Luckett of Petersburg, Va. Her father worked for the Adams Express Co., and was transferred to Washington, D.C., where she spent her childhood.

Throughout her life, Davis was known for her vivacious, outgoing style and kindnesses to those in need.

"They broke the mold after they made my mother," her daughter Nancy wrote in a tribute to her mother in 1984. "If I could be half the woman she is, I'd be happy..." Her daughter described her as having a "delicious, wicked wonderful sense of humor" and a "fierce loyalty to her family."

Nancy Reagan wrote that her mother, a budding actress, got her first break at age 14 when her brother Joe gave her her first job in a theater he ran.

Her career on the stage included appearances in New York with George M. Cohan and Spencer Tracy — who later became a close friend. She also worked with Walter Huston, Zasu Pitts, David Belasco, Louis Calhern and Hilla Nazimova, the famous actress who became her daughter's godmother.

The young actress was married briefly to Kenneth Robbins, a New Jersey businessman, but the union broke up shortly after Nancy's birth, and the couple was later divorced.

She was forced to tour in plays to support herself and daughter, and entrusted Nancy to her sister Virginia Galbraith in Bethesda, Md. She was able to spend time with her daughter only during her prolonged engagements on Broadway.

Her life changed dramatically after her marriage on May 21, 1929, to Loyal Davis, a prominent Chicago neurosurgeon, who later adopted Nancy when she was 14. Mrs. Davis gave up her acting career and devoted herself to her husband, family and community work. Loyal Davis had one son from a previous marriage, Richard.

She organized the gift shop at Passavant Hospital, and became the first chairman, from 1938 to 1963, of the women's division of the Chicago Community Fund, and served on the boards of the American Cancer Society and of the Passavant Hospital.

In recognition of her work, Davis received the Arizona Lifetime Achievement Award from the Association of Retarded Citizens of Arizona in 1983.

In 1982, an endowed chair was established at Northwestern in the Davis' names in recognition of the couple's long association with the university's medical school.

Teachers start meeting

Educators from more than 15 states are in Manhattan for the Ninth Annual Rural and Small Schools Conference that started Monday and continues through today.

Schools are rural communities "hope for the future," said Fran Parmley, assistant director for the Center for Rural Education in Small Schools.

The school is usually the center for social life as well as education, and if the school closes, the community may disappear as well, she said.

The conference is aimed at providing opportunities for rural educators to exchange ideas and compare notes, Parmley said.

Harlan Priddle, Kansas Secretary of Commerce, was the keynote speaker for the first session of the conference.

Carlson glad she decided to 'stay at home'

By Bill Lang
Sports Writer

For senior Kelley Carlson, there is no place like home, sweet home. "When I was being recruited while in (Manhattan) high school, I realized I had the chance to get away from home and travel," she said. "But I just decided to stay at home."

Her decision to stay in Manhattan to play volleyball, though, has seen its ups and downs. In Carlson's freshman season, in 1984, the Wildcats were 19-14. The following year, K-State improved to 21-11. Last season, the down period hit.

"It was hard losing that many games last year," said Carlson of the 12-17 record posted a year ago. "Everyone seemed to be lost in the shuffle and no one really showed much desire to win."

The difference in a year, though, has seen the 'Cats get off to a 14-6 overall mark and a 5-3 mark in the Big Eight Conference.

"Everyone is really playing good this year," Carlson said. "Everyone has a desire to win and to be a leader."

"Last year we had a lot of freshmen," she added. "I'm not putting down the freshmen, it's just that we had a lot of people without playing experience and it hurt us."

Coach Scott Nelson added the biggest improvement in Carlson has been development of consistency.

"When she first came here she was more or less in a reserve role for Helen Bundy and Kristi Jacquart," he said. "This year she has shown consistency in practices and the games and she's shown the leadership abilities along with the consistency."

"This year the biggest surprise has been that she has been serving the opponents real tough," he added. "She hasn't been one of our better servers but she's up there with them now."

In an Oct. 22 match against the University of Missouri, Carlson racked up 18 digs and six blocks. Nelson praised the senior for what he called her best effort of the season. "(That) was her best match of the year. She played very well," Nelson said.

Carlson even said her attitude and style of play have improved since last year.

"Last year I didn't say much," she said. "I was kind of shy and wasn't really one of the leaders of the team. This year my role is one that requires me to talk a lot and I'm enjoying it. "My play this year has also improved," she added. "My defense has really improved upon last year...I can't explain it, but everything's just a lot better."

That defensive improvement has helped Carlson set a K-State record along with teammate Amy Dodson in blocking assists in a four-game match with six.

"I like playing the back row and defense," she said. "I have to play smart and keep on my toes when I'm back there."

And keeping on her toes is easily accomplished when someone like Nelson is watching over the match and practices.

"You know he's there," Carlson said. "He's a real good coach, and he's tough. He knows the game inside and out and he knows when to call the time-outs and when to make the substitutions and who to substitute."

"It's hard to say how much I've learned about volleyball from him," she added. "But comparing my style of play from my freshman year to now, it has improved considerably."

As for the prediction of this year's success and how well the 'Cats can do, Carlson felt that K-State could finish in the top three in Big Eight play.

"We have the talent and the ability to go a long way," she said. "We could finish in the top three."

"Nebraska is the best team in the Big Eight," she added. "But we've taken a few games from them before. Maybe this time around we can do more than that and beat them."

Twins organization has overcome barriers

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Five years ago, the Minnesota Twins lost 102 games. Three years ago, they almost left town. One year ago, they fired their manager for the second straight season.

This week, they won the World Series.

"I can't even begin to describe how far this organization has come," said Tom Brunansky, one of six Twins remaining from the 60-102 club of 1982. "We were bad. Worse than bad. And look what we are now. World champions."

"We've come a long way. We've overcome a lot of adversity," said Kirby Puckett, who joined the team in 1984, when then-owner Calvin Griffith almost sold the team to a group that wanted to move it to Florida. Griffith finally sold the Twins to Minneapolis banker Carl Pohlad.

"I'm very proud of the organization," said Manager Tom Kelly, hired at the end of 1986 after the Twins fired Ray Miller, who had replaced the fired Billy Gardner the previous season. "I just hope I can be around a while longer to experience this some day again."

Frank Viola, who won two World Series games, was voted Most Valuable Player in the series. Gary Gaetti, the offensive and defensive leader against the Detroit Tigers in the American League playoffs, was MVP of that series. Viola, Gaetti, Puckett, Brunansky, Kent Hrbek, Jeff Reardon and Greg Gagne all will receive votes as the season's most valuable Twin.

But there are some who believe that the Metrodome, the downtown bubble that holds in all that eardrum-shattering noise, was the true MVP.

After all, that's where the Twins fashioned baseball's best regular-season home record, 56-25, and where they recorded six of their eight postseason victories, including all four World Series triumphs. More than 2 million fans, a club record, attended Twins games in 1987.

Meanwhile, the Twins were 29-52 on the road, the worst record ever for a first-place finisher.

"We appreciate the fans and their support. They've been great and we love them," Kelly said. "But it's the boys on the field that get the job done, not the fans. The boys are the ones that have to perform, to pitch, to hit, to field."

The boys on the field had a most interesting season.

For all intents and purposes, it began Sept. 12, 1986, when the Twins named Kelly interim manager to close out a 71-91 season. During the off-season, Pohlad turned over total control to Andy MacPhail.

Bruised, battered Cardinals endured through '87 season

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Twice in three years, the St. Louis Cardinals have had their wings clipped in the World Series. This time, they possibly shouldn't have been there.

"If somebody had told me all the bad things that were going to happen to us this year, I'd have said we'd be lucky to get where we did," center fielder Willie McGee said following Sunday night's 4-2 loss to the Minnesota Twins in Game 7.

"But we just kept playing as hard as we could and doing our jobs every day," McGee said. "We had a lot of adversity, but sometimes that's how you form your character. I feel that in spite of getting beat, it may even make us better."

The team Minnesota defeated was not to be mistaken for the team that started the year for St. Louis.

First baseman Jack Clark, whose bat provided the only legitimate power to supplement the Cardinals' speed for the first half of the season, sat out the last seven weeks with an injured ankle. As if that weren't enough, third baseman Terry Pendleton joined Clark on the bench for all but designated-hitter duties during the Series because of a rib-cage injury.

"I know this team isn't one that likes to make excuses, so I won't do that," Pendleton said of St. Louis.

"But, still, it makes you wonder. You wonder what we might have achieved without all the injuries. I guess we'll never know, and that's what makes it a little tough."

Almost from the beginning, the Cardinals had the makings of a team that was star-crossed.

Catcher Tony Pena suffered a broken thumb on the season's third day. Nine days later, pitcher John Tudor broke his leg. Other subsequent injuries, although less devastating, persisted.

"At one point in the season, I almost hated to check with (trainer) Gene Gieselman to see who was hurt," Manager Whitey Herzog said.

"Fortunately, we got a lot of help from players we really hadn't counted on and that kept us from falling apart. If we hadn't, we could have been buried by July. I'd say the last half of the year, we were just holding on."

Help for the Cardinals, who limped home from a lead of 9½ games they held shortly after the All-Star break to win the National League East by three games over the New York Mets, came from players who eventually wound up playing in the World Series.

Catcher Steve Lake was part of the reason for St. Louis' strong start while filling in for the injured Pena. Versatile Jose Oquendo played all positions except catcher.

Network coverage suffers

While the return of the National Football League's regular players this week may not have been the most impressive spectacle in recent memory, network coverage of the "real" NFL games had to be even worse.

It all started at noon Sunday when Kansas City area viewers (including Manhattan) began watching the Tampa Bay Buccaneers start a possible upset of the Chicago Bears on KCTV-5 out of Kansas City, Kan.

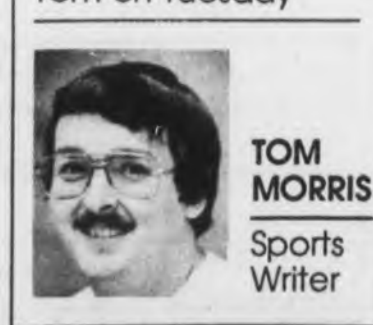

With Tampa Bay leading 14-0 midway through the first half, viewers heard the famous words — "We now join our regularly scheduled program in progress" — and the game was replaced with a rerun of "Trapper John, M.D."

A spokesperson in the programming department at KCTV, who wanted to remain anonymous, said the game was never intended to be televised in this area.

"It was an engineering error here. We were never under contract to carry that game. We only had the option to carry the 3 p.m. contest (Kansas City at San Diego)," she said.

Although the station received about 50 complaints, she said it "was nothing considering some of the things we've done in the past."

By the way, while Trapper John was in teleconference with Marcus Welby trying to discover a cure for "Double Hydrochloric Hemorrhoids," quarterback Jim McMahon made a triumphant return for the Bears and led Chicago to a come-from-behind, 27-26 victory.

Well, since the Bears were bumped, it was time to switch to a different channel and NBC's coverage of the New York Jets at against Redskins in Washington. Announcer Marv Albert is quite the card, isn't he? While plugging the next installment of the NFL doubleheader,

Ruggers limited by roster

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

The K-State rugby squads had a tough Saturday, as they were able to take only 27 players to Omaha to fill three 15-man rosters for play against the Omaha Goats and Creighton University.

The K-State A-side was defeated by the Omaha Goats in a close contest, falling 4-3. This may have been an admirable feat when taking into account that five of K-State's players played in the B-side contest previously, a 10-8 victory over Creighton. The C-side was defeated by the Goats' B-team, 14-0.

"We were short some of our players who had previous commitments," head coach Danny Blea said. "We had a few guys that had to play a tough 80-minute contest, switch their jerseys and five minutes later play another tough 80-minute contest."

"We stayed with them the entire contest, it could have gone either way."

"It was quite an accomplishment when you take into account that five of our players played in both games and really gave it their all," team selector Greg Barnes added. "The effort was really good because the Goats are one of the best teams in the Western union and to only lose by one point was remarkable."

"I think the reason that we played three matches with only 27 players is that K-State has a reputation of wanting to play. We schedule three matches a week because we usually won't have any problem fielding three teams. I don't think this (lack of players) will happen again."

In the C-side match, the Goats were also forced to use some of their A-side players, so both teams got quite a workout.

"The Goats treated us royally after the match," Barnes said. "I think we got treated well because these other clubs respect us and they know we want to play rugby. That is why they want to stay in a close affiliation with the K-State rugby club."

"We could have won and probably should have," Barnes added. "The big thing for us was that we got people in to play that really wanted to play. Some of our B- and C-side guys really got quite a bit of playing time in this weekend."

"If there is anything to be satisfied with in a losing performance, it was the fact that we got good, gutsy play."

Albert said, "stay tuned for Kansas City at Denver or the Los Angeles Raiders at Minnesota."

Was it intentional or was Albert lost in the "Scab Shuffle"? We'll never know, but I guess those teams must have been playing in the wrong cities (note the heavy sarcasm used here). Kansas City lost at San Diego, 42-21; Los Angeles lost at Seattle, 35-13; and last night Denver played at Minnesota.

And due to contractual agreements with the NFL, Kansas City area viewers had to leave the exciting closing minutes of the Jets-Redskins game to watch commercials before the start of the Chiefs-Chargers clash. While a washed-up ex-jock pushed disposable razors, Ali Haji-Sheikh kicked a 28-yard field goal with 54 seconds left that gave the 'Skins a one-point win.

We won't go into too much detail here since it's a well-known fact that you can't fight city hall.

But what am I supposed to do with the 10,000 disposable razors, 30 gallons of after-shave, 14 new cars, 56 sets of tires, 800 kegs of beer and 20 truckloads of food products those commercials inspired me to buy?

Computer network provides students with many resources

By Jackie Wendt
Collegian Reporter

"Keyed-in" to the latest information and technology, the K-State computer network provides K-State students with a large number of resources, said Tom Gallagher, director of Computing and Telecommunications Activities.

K-State's computer system is a principal computer network connecting terminals and microcomputers through an electronic data switch to academic, administrative, engineering, computing science and physics computers, he said.

"The system connects into a switch, and the switch asks you which one of these resources you want to be connected to," Gallagher said.

A person must know the password and account number of a resource in order to break into the resource's computer file, he said.

"The switch is not a security mechanism, and the terminals in the public laboratories cannot enter into the administrative securities," Gallagher said. "It's from terminal to computer and not computer to computer."

K-State's system has never been broken into, he said.

"It isn't something that you break into — it's there to use," Gallagher said.

"It's an economical way to connect up to 1,300 terminals to multiple computer systems," he said. "There are public laboratories so that students who use the terminals may choose to go to the multiple terminal computers."

"The data-switch system, which has been used at K-State for the past two years, is what allows you to come in on one phone line and switch over to the route of one of these computers," Gallagher said.

When the main switch doesn't work, it is impossible to get to any of the computer sources, he added.

"Parts of the switch are redundant," Gallagher said. "A part can fail, but (the data switch can) still continue to function."

He said the kinds of information the computers will store vary.

"For example, the administrative system handles all University financial and student records, the academic system has instructional and research information stored, and the engineering system has program data for computer-aided design and computer-aided engineering," Gallagher said.

Iranians urged to mobilize for war

By The Associated Press

KUWAIT — An Iranian leader Monday urged Iran to mobilize for an all-out war against the United States, and senior officials from Iraq and Kuwait met to discuss a coordinated defense against Iran.

British officials meanwhile confirmed that Kuwait has registered two of its tankers to fly the British flag and is in the process of registering a third.

A prominent Palestinian guerrilla leader pledged that Palestinians would fight alongside Kuwait to help gulf Arab states deter Iranian "aggression."

The British move would entitle the Kuwaiti vessels to the protection of British warships. At least three British warships and four mine sweepers are stationed in the Persian Gulf.

Eleven of Kuwait's 22 tankers have been registered under the American flag, giving them U.S. naval protection from attack by Iran, which considers Kuwait an ally of Iraq in the seven-year Iran-Iraq war.

One tanker, the Sea Isle City, was hit by an Iranian missile in Kuwaiti waters Oct. 16, wounding 18 crewmen, including the American captain.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Interior Minister Hojatolislam Ali Akbar Mohtashemi as urging "people in every Iranian city and village to be prepared for a full-fledged war" with the United States in the gulf.

"Since we are facing a savage enemy, we should mobilize all our resources and manpower to deal effective blows against" the United States, Mohtashemi, a leading radical, was quoted as telling regional governors in Tehran.

He branded the Americans as "weak and cowardly" and declared that "any slight blow" would intensify President Reagan's political problems over the deployment of U.S. warships in the gulf.

Iraq's First Deputy Prime Minister Taha Yassin Ramadan and Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz wound up several hours of defense talks with Kuwaiti officials.

In the past 11 days, there have been three Iranian missile attacks on Kuwait. Kuwaiti newspapers also have blamed Iran for Saturday's bombing of a ticket agency representing Pan American World Airways.

State-run Kuwait Radio said the Iraqi officials discussed Tehran's "repeated aggressions" against Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia with the Kuwaitis. It did not elaborate.

The Iraqis' visit followed a meeting in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia of foreign ministers of the Saudi-led Gulf Cooperation Council. Member states closed ranks with partner Kuwait against Iran, which attacked Kuwait with Chinese-made Silkworm missiles.

China has sold Iran as many as 96 missiles under a $1 billion-a-year arms program that is complicating efforts to end the war.

Responding to the arms sales, the United States announced last week it was imposing mild trade restrictions on the Chinese.

concept of classicism," he said. Rankin said the University needs a more active recruitment effort to secure minorities at the student, faculty and administrative levels.

Coffman said Rankin was chosen as the program's consultant because of his experience working with other minority programs.

"To be really successful, there is a need for extra funding (through) scholarships, summer programs, etc. We happen to be in the unique position of having someone on campus who has a long history of that kind of activity," Coffman said.

Rankin directed the Midwest Center for Equal Educational Opportunity at the University of Missouri-Columbia and the Midwest Sex and Race Desegregation Center at K-State.

"Dr. Rankin's extensive background, expertise and acquaintance in these areas will increase (the University's) ability to enhance ethnic diversity in our academic programs," Coffman said.

The program is considering options for achieving its goals, one of which is a "future consortium" expanding beyond Kansas to link up with institutions having large numbers of minorities, Rankin said. Examples of these institutions would be the Missouri Institute of Technology and universities on the east and west coasts like the University of California-Berkeley or Harvard University, he said.

From 1971 to 1981, K-State had bilateral relations with large numbers of black universities in the South, Rankin said. The administration will be trying to reactivate those relations.

"This (program) isn't something that you can do overnight...It has to be supported campus-wide," he said. "We're in the process of hooking up with a lot of folks. We're not approaching it from one aspect — we're trying to go a lot of different ways."

family" and "anti-woman." "We're concerned about films which contain the rape myth," Roberts said.

Such films show women receiving sexual pleasure from a sexual assault, Roberts said.

One of the picketers, Les Bieber, Manhattan, said he was not a member of the group but was concerned about the impact of pornography on children.

"I have a lot of grandkids and I don't want them getting messed up in pornography," Bieber said.

risk is high."

The stock market has significantly heightened the perceived risk, he said.

"The risk in a collective and societal sense has been raised. People are asking questions they didn't ask before," he said. "The stock market is one big component adding to the perceived risk."

In addition, if consumers slow their spending, it will have a particularly damaging effect on the U.S. economy since it is so oriented toward buying on credit and disregards substantial savings.

"The willingness to consume is very important to the major economies of the world," he said.

Although the stock market collapse may be perceived as causing other economic woes, Oldfather said it really is a mirror of the current state of affairs and reacts as such.

"Mostly the stock market reflects problems," he said. "The erratic movements reflect a great deal of uncertainty, which is not a great friend of economic stability. The market is just catching up with deep-seated concerns."

Furthermore, "It's not likely that the stock market decline by itself will make the economy take a nosedive."

The Dow's Oct. 19 crash of 508 points drew inevitable comparisons to the Black Tuesday of October 1929, when the market's crash ushered in the Great Depression. But those comparisons are generally unfounded, Oldfather said.

"Most of the commentary I've heard is that the comparisons are unfair and inaccurate," he said, adding that a number of safeguards have been instituted since 1929. Among them:

■ Banks are prevented by law from sinking excessive amounts of their capital into the market as they did in '29.

■ Personal bank accounts are insured.

■ A network of social security programs protect individuals.

■ And, Oldfather said, the Federal Reserve is unlikely to tighten the money supply as was the case in 1929.

"Undoubtedly, the government would not be so stupid as to put on the brakes and exacerbate the situation," he said.

Commissioners seek plan to handle press if Aggie riot occurs

By Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

As plans for avoiding a disturbance after the Nov. 7 K-State-University of Kansas football game near finalization, City Commissioners clashed Tuesday night over the necessity of a plan to deal with the press.

Two commissioners said Manhattan officials should be on hand to give statements to the press if there is a repeat of the disturbances which followed last year's K-State-KU game.

"God forbid if something bad happens; the public is going to come back and ream us if someone is not there to speak for the city," said Commissioner Nancy Denning.

Mayor Gene Klingler disagreed. "For what? They're not going to come back on us for anything," he said.

Commissioner Kent Glasscock sided with Denning.

"We have to find them some mechanism to get their questions answered," he said.

The disagreement between the commissioners occurred during a question and answer session with Alvan Johnson, director of the Riley County Police Department.

Johnson said he expects 250-300 police officers to be in Manhattan on the night of the game, with 100 of those in Aggieville. Those police officers will come from Wichita, Junction City, Salina, KU, K-State and the Kansas Highway Patrol.

The additional police will be assisting the RCPD in carrying out its duties that day, Johnson said.

The Aggieville Merchants Association has also contracted with Benchmark Security of Topeka to have 12 security guards at gates into Aggieville, said Ellie Brendt, president of the association.

"God forbid if something bad happens; the public is going to come back and ream us if someone is not there to speak for the city."

—Nancy Denning

There was disagreement between Brendt and Johnson about to whom the private security guards would be responsible.

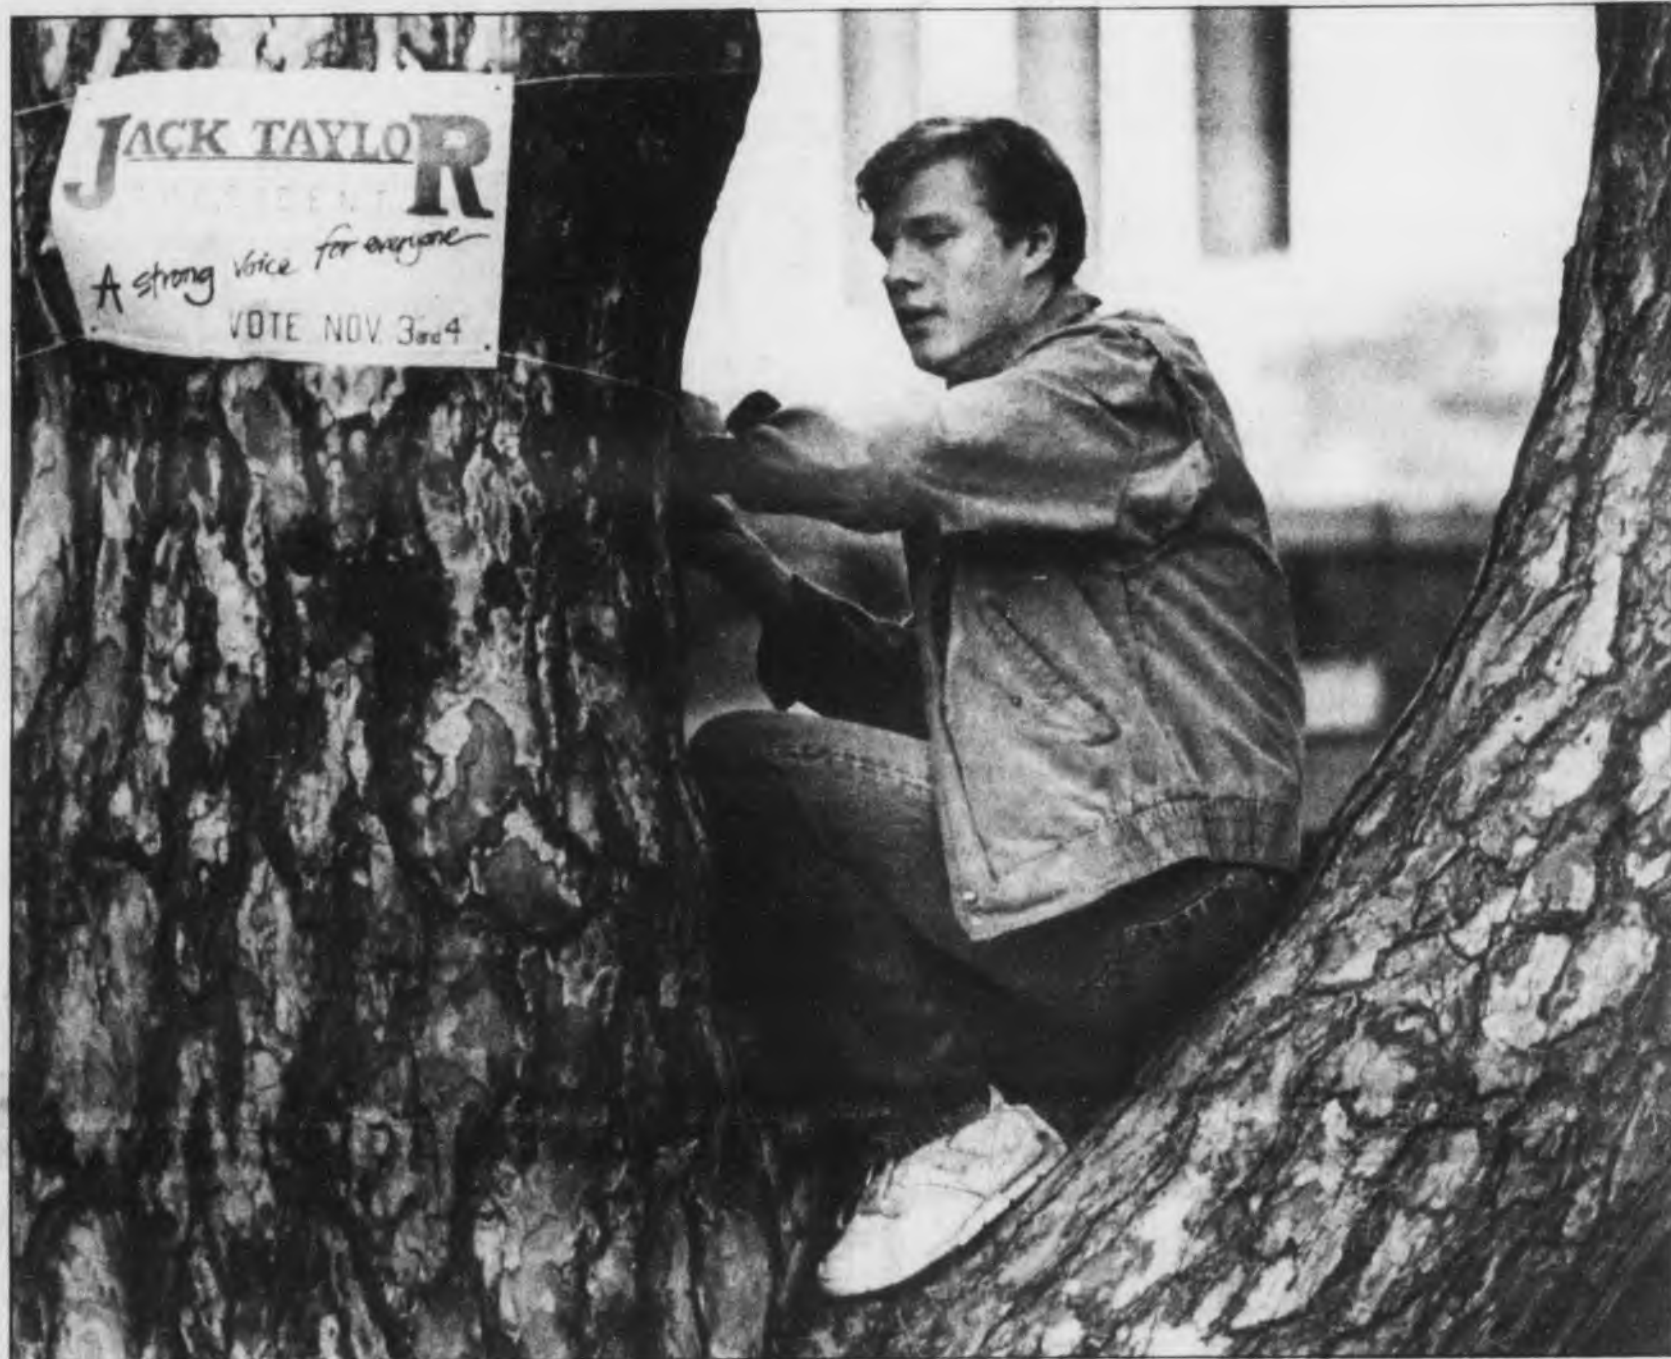

Responding to a question by Glasscock, Brendt said the security guards would be responsible to Johnson.

However, Johnson said the guards would be responsible to the Merchants Association.

Johnson said he is, by statute, responsible for law enforcement in Riley County.

Commissioner Dave Fiser questioned a recommendation from the Merchants Association prohibiting anyone under the age of 17 from entering Aggieville after 8 p.m.

"I don't think legally we can keep high school students out of Aggieville," Fiser said.

Reagan losing war on drugs, critics say

Mayors assail president's program

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A year after President Reagan signed legislation to wage a war on drugs, critics said Tuesday the first battle has been lost and support has failed to reach the front lines: the streets of the nation's cities.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors released a study showing that fewer than half of 42 selected major cities surveyed have received commitments for money under the law for local drug education, treatment and enforcement programs. Fewer still have actually received any of the $700 million.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Select Committee on Narcotics, accused the administration of delaying distribution of the federal money through states to cities.

"Even though it was a tremendous legislative victory and even though the president signed the bill with all the fanfare before the elections, what he has effectively been able to do is to deter the flow of legislative monies into the state and local communities," Rangel said.

Republican Mayor Richard L. Berkley of Kansas City, Mo., president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, released the cities study at a news conference, saying the system for distributing money is too slow and cumbersome. Most of the money goes through state governments.

"This survey suggests that America has lost its first battle in the war on drugs by default," Berkley said. "We hope we can use the survey as an intelligence report on the drug war, convincing the president and the Congress that some major improvements are needed in a war machine just a year old."

Reagan last year signed the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 following its passage by Congress. It provided $1.7 billion in federal money in addition to $2.2 billion already spent each year to combat drugs.

The legislation was passed amid heightened concern over the problem of illegal drugs, following the drug-related deaths of some prominent athletes.

Included was $225 million for enforcement programs, $200 million for education programs and $262 million for treatment and rehabilitation programs during fiscal 1987, which ended Sept. 30.

Berkley noted that in January, Reagan proposed a fiscal 1988 budget that would cut the education grants to $100 million and provide no more money for treatment or enforcement.

Rangel, in a telephone interview, said the administration had delayed releasing much of the money until near the end of the federal fiscal year — in some cases on the last day.

"I have been shocked and embarrassed how that effort can be frustrated by an administration that did not truly believe in the package which it signed into law," Rangel said.

KU students' letters request funds

By Staff and Wire Reports

LAWRENCE — Student leaders at the University of Kansas have spent recent weeks soliciting letters to Gov. Mike Hayden about what they say are terrible academic conditions.

About 450 letters had arrived in the governor's office by last week, and leaders of the campaign say 500 more are on the way.

The K-State director of the Associated Students of Kansas said a similar program is being planned at K-State.

"In November, we're going to do a phone and letter drive similar to KU," said Jennifer Leeds, junior in political science and economics. "It's up to the individual campus to decide (the scheduling of the Higher Education Rescue Operation events)."

Initially, K-State has concentrated on hosting open forums to educate the campus community about HERO and related issues of concern that will come before the Legislature.

The students have joined the Kansas Board of Regents, administrators and faculty in order to promote the "Margin of Excellence" plan to the Legislature. This program would provide $47 million in new state money over the next three years with a goal of making the funding of Kansas' universities comparable to peer schools in other states.

A regents report has shown the seven Kansas schools are funded at 86 percent of the average funding of peer schools, which has resulted in plummeting morale on campus as faculty salary increases fall behind inflation rates, professors leaving for better-paying jobs and further deterioration of buildings and equipment.

These problems are compounded by enrollment increases during the past six years.

The most serious complaints from KU students to Hayden, who has not decided whether to support the funding request, dealt with the unavailability of classes required for most freshmen and sophomores before they can enter junior-year programs.

Professors with a long history at KU also believe academic quality has declined over the years.

"There's not any critical change or crisis that has arisen since the beginning of the fall semester, but I think probably it's one that has been growing for years," said Marlin Harmony, chairman of the chemistry department.

Even the administration, which must defend the school's programs while requesting more money, have stated the academics are suffering.

"It's important to realize that universities have many small environments within them," said Judith Ramaley, executive vice chancellor. "Some programs have been able to maintain the quality of the educational experience. Other programs have been stretched too far."

A February report by the Legislative Division of Post Audit, the Legislature's own auditor, showed that from 1974 to 1985, faculty salary increases fell below inflation, but were about the same as private sector increases and higher than national faculty increases.

While student enrollment has risen steadily in the past five years, the number of faculty has not. The student-faculty ratio has increased from 16.4 students per teacher in the fall of 1983 to 17.5 this fall. The teaching load has been borne increasingly by part-time instructors and graduate teaching assistants.

KU administrators said they expect enrollment to stabilize now because they have set enrollment deadlines — rather than admitting students whenever they apply — and curbed out-of-state enrollment.

Also, the Legislature recently has revised the funding formula to the benefit of KU, enabling the university to hire 24 new full-time faculty members.

"Relief is on the way," Chancellor Gene Budig said. "The situation will be better in the (next) fall," whether or not the Legislature approves the regents' plan.

Gains in foreign markets reduce domestic jitters

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Stock prices rose $37 billion on Wall Street on Tuesday as earlier gains in Asian and European markets encouraged investors to shift some money back into the jittery stock market.

Man who killed Merrill Lynch broker from KC/Page 14

On Wednesday, prices fell on the Tokyo Stock Exchange in afternoon trading after advancing slightly in the morning round. Stock prices edged up in early trading on the Hong Kong market and advanced on the Australian exchange.

Euphoria from higher prices on Tuesday in Tokyo and Hong Kong had sparked a quick rally in New York, sending the Dow average soaring nearly 90 points in early trading.

But traders chipped away at the advance as the day wore on, selling stocks that had made gains during the morning. The Dow slipped to a gain of about 29 points shortly after noon before regaining ground later.

'Real thing' used in class

Human cadavers provide reality

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

Sometimes rats just won't do. For students enrolled in a human anatomy course who want to work with the "real thing," K-State doesn't disappoint them. The University is one of few schools that uses human cadavers, said Lynn Dreese, assistant instructor of biology.

Dreese, who is a lab instructor of the human body course, said it is unusual for students to have this opportunity before entering medical or other professional schools.

K-State is the only school in Kansas in which undergraduate students are able to learn from human bodies — cadavers — in an anatomy class. Dreese said the University of Kansas no longer uses cadavers for its undergraduate course in human anatomy because of vandalism and other problems.

"We won't change (use of cadavers in the course)," Dreese said. "There is nothing like the real thing. A cadaver is a deceased person who, when alive, willed their bodies to science for teaching and/or research."

The KU Medical Center supplies

the cadavers. Two cadavers, a male and a female, are used each semester for the class.

The $300 cost of a cadaver covers the embalming and other preparation done by the Med Center. None of the money goes to the families of the deceased, Dreese said.

"Kansas has a great program," Dreese said. "People know they can do this so they do it for humanity, not to get paid."

Melvin Mohn, professor of anatomy at KU and director of the state's Willard Body Program, said the families must pay for the transportation of the body to the Med Center.

Dreese said the Med Center tries to avoid the possibility of cadavers being recognized by students by shaving the cadavers, filling their faces with extra embalming fluid and sending the cadavers to different parts of the state from where they came.

"Only once since this class began more than 10 years ago has a student recognized a cadaver," Dreese said. "If a student doesn't want to work with the cadavers they don't have to — they can learn from the book and the rats, but it's harder."

"At first the students are hesitant

(to work on the cadavers), but they get over that and are really amazed."

Dreese said the lab instructors try to prepare students to work on the cadavers.

"We tell them (students) that most of the cadavers have lived full lives. They (the cadavers) are even doing something now that they're dead...contributing to the education of students," Dreese said.

The course is especially beneficial for students interested in health, physical education, biology, bio-engineering, dance or just knowing more about their bodies, she said.

The class provides students with the opportunity to learn more about the human body for use in their future careers or for a "greater appreciation of what the human body does and how it's put together," said Michele Bollier, senior in life sciences.

Bollier is a member of a dissection team. Some students enrolled in the course are selected, according to grade point average and class schedules, to be members of the team.

Dreese said students not selected to dissect cadavers have to dissect rats, but they do have the advantage of comparing the two anatomies. The dissection team members receive other benefits such as teaching the non-team members the cadaver anatomy.

"When you have to teach something," Dreese said, "you learn it better and don't forget it as easily."

"You get to spend more time with it (the cadaver) and it helps you learn the anatomy better," Bollier said.

The dissection team members have to spend additional time in the class, but they have the advantage of actually working with a human body, rather than having it all done for them, Dreese said.

"I like that part the best (the dissection)," said Ron Carson, junior in pre-medicine and a member of the dissection team. "I want to be a surgeon so it's a good opportunity for me, and it's fascinating."

The students learn, not just from the book or from lectures, but from "the real thing," Dreese said.

"It's the best preparation they can have for doing well in professional programs," said Bettie Dale, instructor in arts and sciences and adviser of students in pre-medicine, pre-dentistry and pre-optometry.

Iraq claims attack on tanker aiding Iran

By The Associated Press

KUWAIT — Iraq said its warplanes raided a tanker in Iranian waters Tuesday night in the campaign to destroy the oil exports that finance its enemy's war effort.

A brief military communique issued in Baghdad said the planes attacked a "large naval target off the Iranian coast," the customary reference to a tanker, shortly after 7 p.m. It did not identify the vessel and shipping sources in the Persian Gulf could not confirm the claim immediately.

In Kuwait, which has been hit recently by three Iranian missiles and a terrorist bombing, an official was quoted as saying civilians will be trained to help defend the sheikdom.

Preventing attacks by Iranian-trained saboteurs appears to be the plan's main objective. Iran, which has been at war with Iraq since September 1980, accuses Kuwait of supporting its adversary.

The 13th convoy of Navy ships and U.S.-registered Kuwaiti tankers moved up the gulf Tuesday to the home anchorage, where three Silk-worm missiles fired in a week hit two tankers and a major oil-loading facility.

Shipping officials in Kuwait said the convoy was in the central gulf but did not know its precise position. An official of the state-run Kuwait Oil Tanker Co. said: "We will not comment on tanker movements."

Iraq said earlier in the day that its air force made a "successful and effective raid" on the Agha Jari oil field in southwestern Iran. Iran said one plane was shot down.

Reagan administration officials in Washington said that, despite China's denial of arms deals with Iran, a shipload of Chinese-made artillery shells was delivered in the past week and the two countries may be close to another sale of Silk-worm anti-ship missiles.

Hussein Musavi, the Iranian prime minister, said in Tehran that his country's economy will not be affected by a ban on U.S. imports of Iranian goods that President Reagan ordered Monday. Reagan also prohibited some exports to Iran because of "continued and increasingly belligerent behavior of the Iranian government."

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency, monitored in Cyprus, quoted Musavi as saying: "Reagan's act is another stunt and a futile bid to save his lost dignity both inside and outside the United States."

Education, not highways, needs money

If we were to look at the socio-economic status of Kansas as if it were a family, we would most likely classify it as "lower middle class" — hardworking, frugal, able to stretch a buck to its limit, but with a healthy respect for education and a desire for better lives for its children. Of late, though, its political leaders seem to have lost touch with the citizenry and life as it actually exists.

For example, despite the resounding rejection of Gov. Mike Hayden's grandiose highway-building scheme by the special session of the legislature in September, Secretary of Transportation Horace Edwards has proposed another billion dollar highway construction program. If we assume this is not yet another attempt to pay off campaign debts to road contractors and chambers of commerce, then it honestly represents a concept of economic development that must be challenged.

Let's face it. Kansas has very limited resources, even in the best of times. Economic development, for all its hoopla, has not come close to balancing off the economic depression in the farm sector in recent years. More often than not, it amounts to a new Burger King or a small factory paying its employees less than $4 per hour with no fringe benefits such as health insurance.

The idea that good highways bring industrial development and high-tech businesses was a concept too sacred to challenge; that is until former legislator Don Everett took it on

Commentary

JUDD ANNIS

in a letter to the Manhattan Mercury last summer. He pointed out its fallacy, but despite coming from someone with Everett's Republican credentials, the challenge went unanswered, as far as I can tell.

Last March, the Corporation for Enterprise Development, a nonprofit private research group based in Washington, D.C., issued an "economic report card" for each state in the union. This particular analysis was of unusual credibility because it was funded by a widely diverse group of sponsors — four public employees' unions, four foundations, Aetna Life and Casualty Co., J.C. Penney Co. Inc., and the Tobacco Institute.

The group ranked states assigning grades from "B" through "F," by using a different set of factors than more traditional studies, which tend to find low-tax, low-wage states the most desirable locales for business. The grades were based on factors such as employment growth, income per capita, job quality and quality of life, human and capital resources, amenities to attract talent and public policy on education, research and help for distressed communities.

"The traditional index looks at the lowest cost place to do business: the lowest tax costs, the lowest wage costs and the lowest energy costs," said Robert Friedman, president of the research group. "They can measure the cost of everything and the value of nothing."

"My sense is that the comparative advantage of this country is not going to be that we're the lowest-cost place to do routine work... We will compete, not by getting poor but by getting smart, by applying the new technologies, by increasing the quality of education."

In this study Kansas rated a "C," while Nebraska and Oklahoma got "D's," and Arkansas an "F." Texas, Missouri and Colorado also earned "C's." The states walking off with "B's" were Washington, California, Minnesota, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York and Maryland.

"Many states hit hard by recent problems in agriculture, mining, forestry, and petroleum — mainly in the Rockies and the Plains — are not yet pursuing policies that could help them... build strength for long term recovery," the report concluded.

Is the right course for Kansas a billion dollar highway building program? Don Everett didn't think so, and I'm inclined to strongly agree with him. The money spent on the special session itself would have softened the financial crunch K-State suffered last spring.

If the citizens of Kansas are to be asked to bite the bullet and bear financial sacrifices, let it be for a vastly improved educational and research environment at its institutions of higher learning, and opportunities for more citizens, young and old, to take advantage of further education.

Is K-State ready to do its part if the legislature could be persuaded to re-direct its attention from super-highways to super-universities? Not entirely. A restructuring of the University's research efforts may be in order.

There is no doubt that President Jon Wefald was the "man of the hour" when he was installed as K-State's president. He landed in high gear and must be given at least a substantial amount of credit for turning around the enrollment decrease we suffered through for several years. He obviously knew what had to be done in re-establishing the support for the school and persuading prospective students that we had something to offer.

But even President Wefald would acknowledge that his background does not include the experience in obtaining research funding and building a research program that many university presidents bring to the job. The people whom he depends on for advice, including the current Provost, don't appear to have good research organizational experience. Perhaps a position of Research Vice President is needed to focus this activity, while the Provost concentrates on developing a strong teaching program.

A lot of K-State graduates would like to find well-paying, challenging jobs in their native state upon graduation. They don't want to leave because they can't afford to stay. Putting the state's limited resources into bigger and better highways will simply speed their departure; putting the same money into education can lead to a better life for all of us. Let's shoot for a "B" next time.

Language requirements deserve state support

Sprechen Sie Deutsch? ¿Se Habla Espanol? Or parlez-vous Français?

For students who graduated from one of the 63 school districts in Kansas that do not offer any foreign language courses, the answer to the above questions — in any language — is "no."

Some of the school districts in Kansas are complaining that the Board of Education is "ramming" foreign language requirements down their throats.

These complaints stem from a mandate handed down by the State Board of Education which says effective Sept. 1, 1990, all 304 school districts must offer two years of foreign language either at the elementary or secondary level.

Some administrators have gone so far to say that high school students have done well in college without having studied any foreign language, so why should the requirements be changed now?

Simple.

Students need to broaden their worldly perspective and realize the universe doesn't revolve around the United States. They must also realize English is not the official world language.

Some districts complained they did not have the money needed to implement the program. The board has only said the courses must be made available, not that they must have "live" teachers. Options open to schools lacking a foreign language teacher include using videotaped lessons, correspondence courses or teacher-sharing between districts. Of course these options are not the best, but they would suffice.

Learning a foreign language can do more than help people order a taco in a Mexican restaurant. It can broaden the most knowledgeable students' horizons — and school districts can't knock knowledge.

FAA should take action to make air travel safer

Last spring, the Federal Aviation Administration held a press conference in an attempt to disseminate growing concerns about aerial collisions.

That conference came after the disclosure of seven near-collisions involving commercial jetliners within a 9-day period. At that time, FAA officials refused to characterize the events as unusual. FAA administrator Donald Engen said the disclosure of preliminary reports of the incidents had led to an exaggeration of the danger. The reports had yet to be investigated, he said.

Now more figures are in. And the number of near-collision reports involving commercial aircraft has increased even more, from 258 in the first nine months of last year to 383 in the first nine months of this year — a 48.5-percent increase.

The FAA's response: The reports aren't meaningful, because they have yet to be investigated.

In their search for solutions to the situation, officials should start looking for the source of the problem. Much of it can be attributed to federal deregulation of the airline industry, which allowed more airlines to travel to the same destinations. This led to stiff competition among airlines, resulting in cut-rate fares for travelers.

It also resulted in less attention directed at airline safety. In order to charge lower fares, airlines were forced to make cutbacks. All too often, safety was the sacrifice.

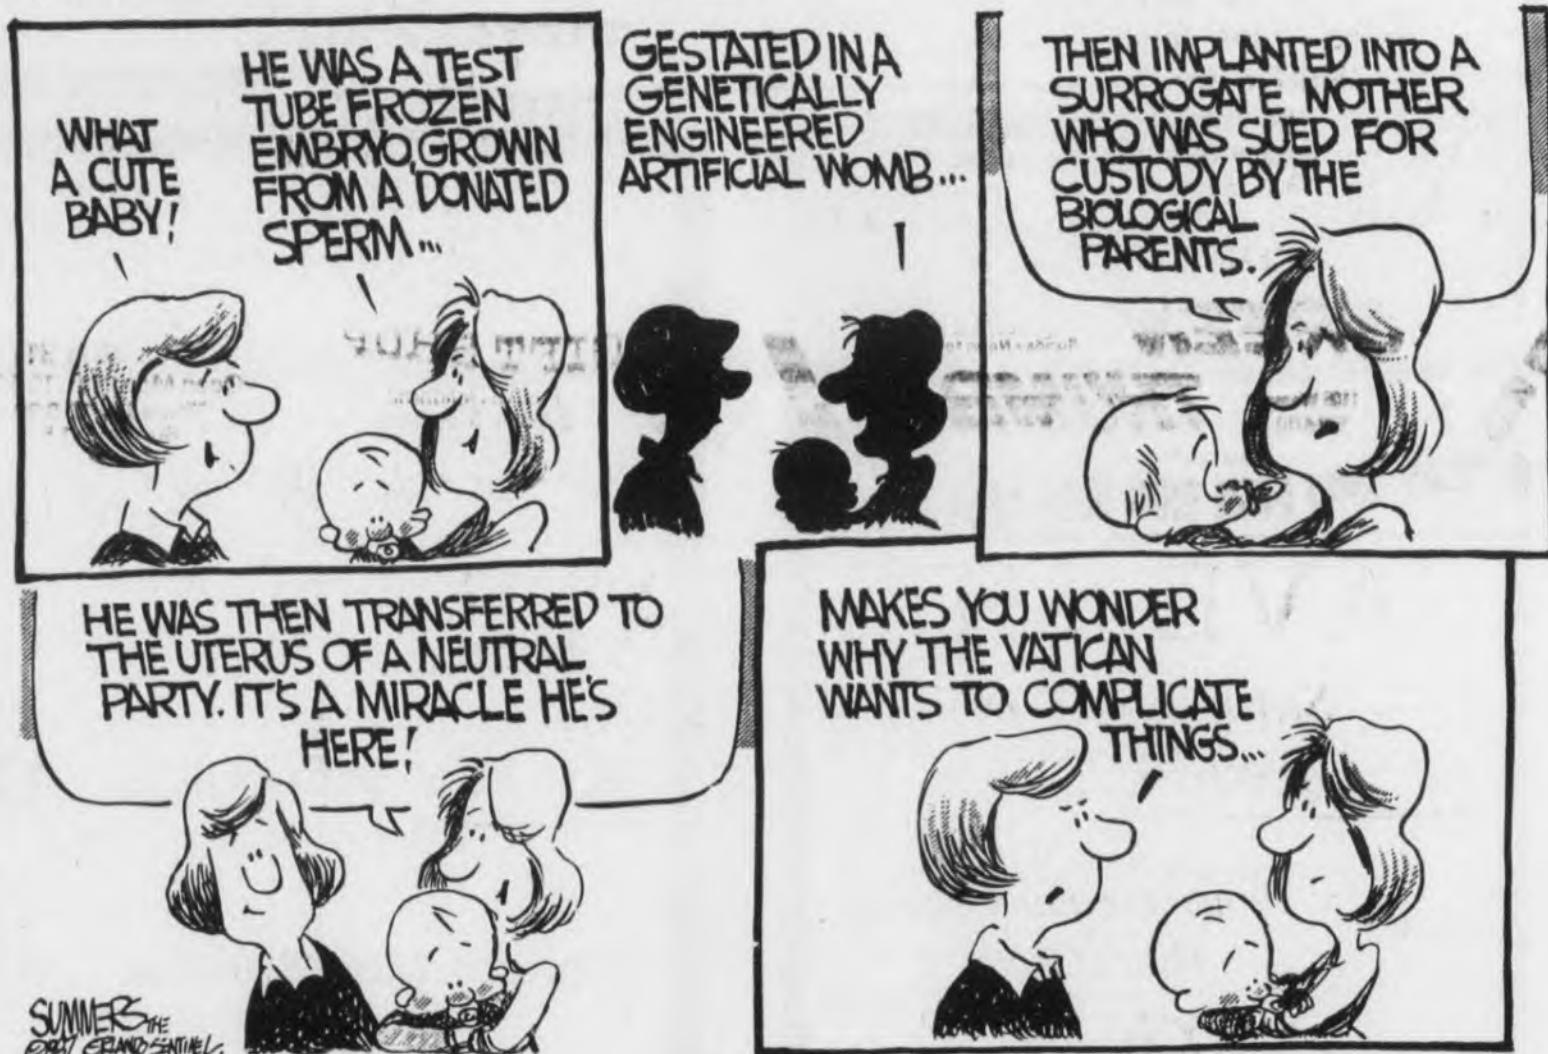

The sharp increase in near-collisions shows that travelers are being exposed to an increased risk of an aerial collision. FAA officials said the increase is a matter of concern, but that the figures are not significant because actual collisions continue to be rare.

But reviews of 608 of the near-collision reports involving commercial and non-commercial aircraft showed that in 75 percent of the cases, the planes passed within 500 feet of each other. And, regardless of whether FAA officials want to believe it, 500 feet short of being an actual collision is significant.

During the first nine months of this year, 19 actual aerial collisions have occurred. FAA officials have no comment except to stress that this number is equal to that of the same period in 1986.

Nineteen collisions is not something to be proud of.

A serious problem exists in our airways. The FAA must stop being on the defensive and start taking action. The dividing line between a near-collision and a fatal disaster is very thin.

Surprise those awaiting Riot III

The hype has begun. The K-State-KU football game is a week and a half away. The University Daily Kansan predicts "Riot III." Other area newspapers are making sure that no one forgets the violence which accompanied post-game celebrations in Aggieville in 1984 and 1986. Aggieville merchants claim to have the solution (again). Opinions born mainly out of ignorance pour in denouncing the students of K-State and proposing all sorts of ridiculous solutions. Despite our best efforts, this ghost continues to haunt us.

I have to start out by giving my assessment of the occurrences following the last two K-State-KU games. I attended both games and was in Aggieville afterward each time. To describe them simply as "Riot I" and "Riot II" is inaccurate. They were different types of disturbances which occurred for different reasons.

In 1984, I think that a large portion of the violence originated from K-State students. In '84, much could be attributed to retribution toward overzealous authorities. At the stadium, mace was used to protect the goal posts from celebrating students. In the streets of Aggieville, where open containers of alcohol were and are prohibited, law enforcement officers used their billy clubs to knock cups of beer out of people's hands, often dousing the offender with beer or striking the individual's hand in the process. This was often done without warning. Eventually, frustration combined with intoxication found an outlet through violence — mainly directed at the officers.

The Aggieville of 1986 was a different scene. It was obvious that the crowd in the streets was comprised largely of the curious, those who had heard of the violence two years ago and wanted to see for themselves. But this led to another more troublesome attitude. Those who came to see the violence wanted to make sure they weren't disappointed, so they helped instigate it.

Commentary

DOUG FOLK

This is the part where I start to get irked. I saw the violence start. I saw the first bottles thrown. They weren't thrown by K-State students. They were thrown by those people who had come to town for a "riot," and were becoming frustrated that nothing really destructive had started yet. Now please understand, while I was extremely angry at those individuals (and I let as many of them as possible know it), they're not the ones at which my true ire is directed.

I was incredulous to discover the large numbers of K-State students who were encouraging them and, yes, a few were joining in! I'm telling you, gang, we must look like the biggest bunch of idiots to those KU students who were in Aggieville that night. They come into town, and their football team gets severely trounced. But no problem, because they can come and tear up our business district, and we help them! And we'll take the blame for it. Don't you see? To outsiders, Aggieville is more K-State than anything on campus. They came in and tore up K-State while a bunch of dumb K-Staters cheered them on.

Maybe you don't believe it's all that big of a problem. Ask the people at the KSU Foundation and the Alumni Association if they have gotten negative responses from alumni — alumni that give money to the University. Ask our admissions representatives, who travelled to Kansas high schools last year, if they have heard negative comments from high school students about going to our "riot school." They'll tell you "yes." At this point in its life, K-State can ill afford to lose out on either money or students, especially because of something like this.

It's time to put an end to it. Yeah, I know, local authorities have a plan to restrict pedestrian and vehicle traffic going into and out of Aggieville that day. And there'll be an army of law enforcement officers from all over the state controlling the crowd. But I'm not convinced. The obvious solution, formally suggested to the Aggieville Merchants by the 1986/87 Student Senate, is to close off Aggieville entirely for the day and put an end to the "tradition." But the merchants, proving once again that they can and will take the University and its students for granted, chose to reject this solution. The immediate financial benefits of the evening proved to be more important than a severely damaged image for K-State.

Since we're the ones that end up suffering, I guess it's up to us to take the step. Actually, if everyone does it, it won't be all that drastic a step to take. Just don't go. Even if you know that you wouldn't be a part of any violence, don't go. The more people that are there, the greater the riot mentality prevails.

I know, you don't want to miss out on the post-game fun. But there are dozens of parties to go to that night. And if nobody goes to Aggieville, then nothing will happen and you won't have missed anything anyway. Let's surprise a few people in this state. Let them hunt through the Sunday morning paper for the riot story, and find only that K-State won the game and that the mall did good business

Mall to heighten traffic problems

By The Collegian Staff

City administrators are foreseeing traffic jams in coming days as a result of the Manhattan Town Center's opening, and even the extension and opening of the southern arterial of Fort Riley Boulevard won't circumvent the traffic problems.

"There really is no way to anticipate traffic like (what the mall's opening will create)," said Jerry Petty, deputy director of public works.

"Manhattan has never seen traffic like what we're expecting," he said. "It should be heavy and steady."

Traffic from the south and southeast sections of town should be relatively smooth, Petty said. The arterial should allow the majority of traffic to flow through the south and southeast entrances of the mall.

"Most people have a habit of entering town from the west. It will take a while for them to realize how much easier it is to enter from the east," he said. "The north and northwest will see the majority of the congestion."

But, Petty hopes a portion of the congestion will be eliminated with the addition of a stoplight at Fourth and Humboldt streets early next year.

"We just don't have the funding to do it now," he said. The installation of the light will cost about $60,000.

More than $8 million was spent by the city and state to improve streets near the mall, including the arterial, Third Street south of Poyntz Avenue, the Leavenworth Street extension and the Tuttle Creek Boulevard expansion.

Film depicts life in London

Movie follows Polish workers' lives

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

If viewers can stay awake through the slow parts, they might enjoy the delightfully funny scenes in "Moonlighting," a movie that presents a first-hand look at the life of four Polish workers trapped in London when martial law is imposed in Poland.

Movie Review

In one of the laugh-out-loud scenes, the main character thinks he has been caught shoplifting, but a bum saves the day by stealing the stolen food off the shoplifter's bicycle.

Despite the humorous scenes, the movie, directed by Polish director Jerzy Skolimowski, is not a comedy. It is a darkly satirical look at life in London, the effects of martial law on Poland and the Polish people, and the relations between workers and their bosses.

Martial law — the enforcement of law in a country by the military — is declared in Poland while the three laborers and their supervisor are illegally employed in London.

Phone calls and airplane flights to Poland are no longer allowed, and the four men slowly run out of their allotted money as they work 18-hour days trying to finish the job.

The job is renovating the boss' London townhouse. The boss, a wealthy Pole, sends Nowak because of his ability to speak English.

After a series of mishaps and lack of sleep, Nowak begins to suspect the boss had other motives when he sent Nowak to London. He suspects the boss of wanting Nowak out of the way because of the boss' interest in Nowak's pretty girlfriend.

Jeremy Irons stars as Nowak, the supervisor who resorts to shoplifting to keep his men fed. As the only member of the work party who speaks English, Nowak decides to hide Poland's troubles from the others.

Nowak is not a member of Solidarity, which has been outlawed in Poland, but the others are. He fears they will become distracted with worry for their families or try to return home before the job is finished.

The London townhouse becomes a symbol of the military oppression in Poland. Nowak represses the workers, practically imprisoning them in the house and forcing them to work with very little sleep. He even resorts to changing the time on their watches so they will think they had slept longer than they actually had.

The workers, symbolizing the state, are kept in order by Nowak, whose sole objective is to finish the job.

Just who it is oppressing the military is not clear, but Nowak is definitely driven by his fear of the boss' disapproval. The boss may be a symbol of the Soviet Union's influence in Poland.

The film starts out slowly and some of the more interesting scenes are not given the importance they deserve, but "Moonlighting" is a movie worth seeing. The effects of martial law on Poland are vivid even though the entire movie is filmed in London.

Leaders search to reduce deficit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Pledging to leave politics at the door, negotiators for Congress and the Reagan administration began searching Tuesday for a mixture of tax increases and spending cuts that would reduce the federal budget deficit enough to pacify world financial markets.

The opening session produced little more than an agreement to resume negotiations Wednesday. Participants spent two hours discussing how they would proceed but were not asked to consider any specifics, according to several lawmakers.

"We talked for awhile and we all left happy," said Rep. John Duncan, R-Tenn.

"Everybody had the right spirit," said Sen. Lawton Chiles, D-Fla., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee. "I considered it progress."

The initial goal for the negotiators is the $23 billion deficit reduction required by the Gramm-Rudman balanced-budget law. House Speaker

Jim Wright, D-Texas, described that figure as a rock-bottom minimum, but some negotiators cautioned against raising expectations of a significantly larger deficit reduction.

President Reagan said the volatile financial markets are signals of potential dangers for the economy. "Anyone who doubted that these threats to our future growth were serious should have been set straight in the last couple of weeks," he said in a written statement.

"We owe it to the nation to get the job done," the president added.

Senate Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., said successful deficit-reduction negotiations would "show that the two parties can work together and that the government can respond to the need."

"I just hope the action is bold enough and soon enough to reassure the markets and the American people," added Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole of Kansas. But he agreed that political differences among negotiators would be put aside.

Man dies Tuesday of electrocution

By The Associated Press

MANHATTAN — A KPL Gas Service lineman was electrocuted Tuesday while working with a crew installing new conductor cable, officials said.

The victim was identified as Steve Launchbaugh, 32, of Manhattan, who had worked for the company since 1976.

Hal Hudson, a company spokesman in Topeka, said a preliminary investigation indicated there was an apparent failure in a device used to maintain tension in lines.

Fair to focus on health awareness

Education, screening tests highlight event

By Nancy Hill
Collegian Reporter

Increasing awareness of personal health and the effects certain lifestyles can have on the quality of life is the purpose of the sixth annual K-State Health Fair.

The health fair starts at 9 a.m. and runs through 2 p.m. today in the main ballroom of the Union. It is sponsored by Lafene Student Health Center.

"The health fair is a means by which faculty, staff and students can identify areas in their lives where they can improve the quality of life or the longevity of life," said Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene.

Community professionals and a lot of other organizations on- and off-campus donate time doing exhibits and screening, she said.

The health fair will be structured in two basic categories — health screening and health education, Burke said.

Screening will include blood-pressure tests, vision checks, glaucoma testing, dental assessments and physical fitness assessments. The health education stations will offer information on topics including alcohol, stress management, nutrition, biofeedback and cancer.

"All of these stations are totally optional, and the admission is free," Burke said.

Two options available to participants for a minimal charge are blood chemistry profiles and flu vaccinations.

The blood chemistry testing will be done for $7 and gives participants profiles of their blood from the 23 tests that are run. Students who choose to have a blood chemistry profile done cannot eat for 12 hours prior to the testing.

"The blood profiles can give students a base line of what is normal for them at this time in their lives," Burke said. "They can then look back on this later down the road and know how things such as their cholesterol have changed."

The flu vaccinations will be available for $6.

These vaccinations are recommended for "at-risk individuals," Burke said. "These individuals include those with allergies, immune disabilities, pulmonary problems and the elderly."

She said the fair has been quite successful in the past, and she estimated more than 500 people participated in last year's event.

Riley County not affected by prison overcrowding

By Staff and Wire Reports

Many of the nation's local jails are suffering from serious overcrowding problems, according to a Bureau of Justice Statistics report released this week. The jail population jumped 23 percent to 274,000 in a three-year span ending June 30, 1986.

The bureau found the occupancy rate of large local jails running 8 percent above the acceptable rated capacity.

"The jail system in Manhattan serves all of Riley County," said Les Bieler, assistant director of the Riley County Police Department. The jail is designed to be able to hold up to 27 people. Bieler said the occupancy rate is not a problem for Riley County.

"It's overcrowded only on the weekends," Bieler said.

Bieler attributes the weekend overcrowding problem to "people who have to serve weekend jail time and other activities such as fights and drunks."

The report stated that by mid-year of 1986, one in four jail systems that held more than 100 prisoners were under court order to reduce their numbers.

The bureau also found that local jails become overcrowded when used to "take some of the spillover from the state prison systems."

Bieler said Riley County does not receive inmate spillover from the state prisons.

Many jails are needing improved conditions as well as a reduction in the number of inmates, the bureau's report stated.

"The jail inspectors are complimentary of our jail," Bieler said.

Riley County does need more space, Bieler said, because "more people need to be in jail that aren't."

Basting, baking and boiling with...

BREW

No, this food will not get you drunk. But, beer can give a new richness and unique taste to many ordinary foods and dishes.

Beer has long been ignored when it comes to cooking. Although famous as a liquid that quenches thirst, aids in socialization and causes intoxication, beer is not widely used as a cooking ingredient.

Beer enhances the flavor of many dishes and adds a new quality to the food as well. It improves the texture and lightness of all kinds of cakes, pies and batters; has a tenderizing effect on tough meats; helps preserve foods; makes bread rise; adds a stimulating new taste to dull vegetables; and glazes roast meats, to mention only a few of its culinary virtues.

Some partying beer drinkers perceive a negative aspect of cooking with beer: the alcohol burns off when the food is cooked. However, this may be an advantage to those who wish to abstain from alcohol or plan to serve the food to children.

Once the alcohol burns off, all that remains of the beer is an increased tastiness in the food.

Those who do not find the taste of beer appealing will be glad to hear that beer is not a take-over seasoning. Its yeasts and enzymes add a pleasant accent to the main ingredients of a dish without imposing a beer personality.

Although beer cooking is not well-known, it is a classic cooking form in several countries. Welsh rarebit, Belgian stew, German cheese snacks, Spanish mackerel stew, Bavarian casserole, Austrian cheddar triangles and Swedish beer soup are but a few of the dishes making use of beer.

In addition to its unique cooking properties, beer is also high in minerals such as niacin, potassium, and phosphorus. It also contains vitamin B.

For those watching their weight, beer is a bonus in food, not a hindrance. A cupful of beer contains only 100 calories — and even less after the alcohol is burned off. This is close to the caloric content of skim milk. Beer can season the low-caloric fare of the dieter, increasing the satisfaction with the food without significantly increasing the calories.

Beer Bangers

Quantities are ignored here. A large or a small amount of bangers can be made, depending on appetite.

Ingredients: pork sausages, butter, salt, beer, flour, mashed potatoes.

Blanch the sausages for a minute by pouring boiling water over them. Drain, dry, and brown the sausages in butter and a little salt. Add half a pint of beer (heavy or dark beer is preferred), bring quickly to a boil, and boil for a few minutes. Add some more beer — just enough to cover the sausages — and simmer for 15 minutes. Using a strainer, separate the sausages from the sauce. Add enough flour to thicken the sauce. Dish the sausages and their sauce into a border of mashed potatoes.

Beer-baked Ham

Ingredients: 8-pound ham, ½ cup brown sugar firmly packed, 1 tablespoon dry mustard, 2 tablespoons vinegar, 2 cups beer.

In baking a whole ham, first wash it well and trim most of the fat off. Cover ham with cold water. Bring slowly to boiling point, then simmer for 3 hours. Remove from water. Skin. Make paste of sugar, mustard and vinegar and spread over ham. Bake at 350 degrees for 1½ hours, basting frequently with beer. (A smaller ham can be used with ingredients reduced proportionately.)

Shepherd's Pie

Ingredients: 2 (1½ pound) cans beef stew, ½ cup beer, 3 tablespoons flour, 2 tablespoons water, enough instant or home-made mashed potatoes for 6 people, 2 tablespoons frozen and chopped chives.

Combine beef stew and beer. Heat until bubbly. Mix flour with water and stir into beef stew. Cook until stew is thickened slightly. Pour stew into casserole dish. Prepare mashed potatoes; stir in chives. Spoon potatoes over stew. Bake for 10 to 15 minutes at 400 degrees or until potatoes are slightly browned.

Butterfly Fudge Cake

Ingredients: 1 (1 pound, 1½ ounces) package fudge cake mix, 1 (12 ounce) can or bottle of beer, grated rind of 1 orange, 1 can or package prepared chocolate frosting, grated coconut.

Prepare cake mix as directed on package using beer in place of water. Beat in grated orange rind. Pour batter into well-buttered layer cake pans. Bake in a preheated oven at 350 degrees for 30 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly touched. Cool on a rack in pans; remove layers. Spread frosting on bottom layer; place second layer on top. Cut cake in half and place round sides together to form butterfly shape. Frost top and sides of cake. Decorate with grated coconut.

Welsh Rarebit

Ingredients: 2 tablespoons butter, 1 pound sharp cheddar cheese (grated), 1 cup beer, 1 egg (beaten), 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon dry mustard, ¼ teaspoon cayenne, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce.

In saucepan, slowly heat butter. Add cheese and beer, and cook over low heat until cheese melts, stirring frequently. Remove from heat. Beat egg with salt, mustard, cayenne and Worcestershire sauce and gradually add to cheese mixture, stirring until heated and smooth (about 5 minutes). Serve on toast or English muffins.

Beer Batter

Can be used for fried shrimp, fish, onion rings, chicken, mushrooms.

Ingredients: 1 can beer, 1 cup sifted flour, 1 tablespoon salt, 1 tablespoon paprika.

Combine the above ingredients in a bowl, stirring with a wire whisk.

Beer cakes

Mix together equal parts of beer and heavy cream; then mix with any prepared pancake flour. Spoon onto a hot griddle for small or large pancakes, as desired. Spread cakes with butter and jelly, or with butter and cream cheese, or butter and syrup. Good for breakfast or as a dessert.

Cheese Beer Snacks

Ingredients: 1 cup beer, ½ pound American cheese, 4 slices bacon, 4 slices white bread, 8 tablespoons mustard.

Spread the bread thickly with mustard, lay on a baking sheet, and brown lightly in the oven. Take out baking sheet, sprinkle bread slices with beer. Cover with slices of the cheese ¼-inch thick. Lay two half-slices of bacon on each. Return to the oven and cook until cheese is melted and bacon done.

Cooking with beer: A taste 'Bud' flavor sensation

K-State would not have the flair it does, if not for Aggieville. Think about how often each of us sits in our local Aggieville tavern chugging down a "cold one." You never realized how much beer fits into your everyday life.

Those occasional rum balls at Grandma's have probably been your only experience with alcohol in food. As a child, you would sneak a rum ball behind Grandma's back and swear you were getting drunk just like Uncle Ted.

What about the beer bread that was your dad's favorite? Tasting it, it somehow never tasted like what you thought it would. Kind of bland and no beer taste at all.

Then there are the movies which show a common housewife becoming an alcoholic while preparing supper for her family.

Food for Thought

SUSAN STAGGENBORG

Features Editor

"A dash of sherry here, a little bit for me."

Julia Child and all of the other French chefs use wine when they prepare their French dishes. I've decided the French would not know what food tasted like without wine.

Well, look beyond rum balls and beer bread and think of the endless possibilities of cooking with any type of alcohol — especially beer. Meats, vegetables, cakes and cookies can all be seasoned with this inebriating liquid.

When testing beer recipes — especially the ones with beef — you'll find the light beers are lacking in flavor and do very little to enhance the food. When used with meat recipes, light beers can be enhanced by adding a bouillon cube to the other ingredients.

Bock (a heavy, dark, rich beer) is better for cooking. If it is not available, use the beer you enjoy most.

It makes no difference if you use canned or bottled beer for your recipes. Just make sure it is not flat in flavor.

Many of you probably did not know there was any special way to store and serve beer. Well, there is.

Keep your beer in a cool, dark place (if it lasts long enough to store, that is). Light tends to break down the chemistry of beer, making it cloudy and unpalatable.

Beer reaches its peak of flavor at about 40 to 42 degrees.

The best way to serve beer? Tip a glass and pour the beer onto the inside of the glass until it is half-full. This will prevent an overflow of foam.

There are five basic kinds of beer:

Pale ale: a brisk, refreshing beer with a stronger hop flavor, always pale amber in color. Pale ales include draft and bottled ales.

Mild or brown ales: strong, yet mild flavored beer. Has less hops and more malt and sugar.

Stout: black, robust and full-bodied beer. Stouts are among the stronger beers. They contain more hops than the other beers, giving them a more bitter flavor.

Old ale: strong and mellow beer. Dark in color.

Lager: Delicately flavored beer with fewer hops, giving it a lighter and more mild flavor.

Try some of the recipes provided on today's food page. Buy yourself a six-pack of beer and experiment. Beer is not only a beverage; it can be one of the most natural flavor enhancers and can provide a little fun in your next cooking session.

K-State police secure campus community

By Jackie Brazzle
Collegian Reporter

With two police forces existing in Manhattan, people may wonder about the division of jurisdiction between the Riley County Police Department and the K-State Police.

The campus police provide "security for the academic community" by enforcing all city, state, county and federal laws applicable to the campus, said K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom.

Beckom said campus police are fully authorized and recognized as a law enforcement body and the prime law enforcement agency for the University.

The department provides a variety of services for the students, faculty and staff on campus. Department personnel sell the parking permits, enforce parking regulations, oversee the placement of lot signs and street signs, and manage the parking system on a daily basis.

"The department is able to input ideas on what needs to be done and what can be done about the parking problem," Beckom said.

They also provide support services for the campus. They have assisted Students Against Drunk Driving by providing the buttons for its alcohol awareness program. They unlock doors to buildings and cars as needed, support the health fair, provide monthly tips to Jardine residents and their children, and post crime-prevention posters. Beckom said the department also provides the emergency phones located across campus.

Jurisdictional boundaries do exist for the campus police officers and are set by the Board of Regents. The boundary extends beyond the University itself to areas adjacent to the campus. Beckom said the reason adjacent areas are included is because the University uses those areas — such as streets surrounding the sororities, fraternities, Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex and the farm lands of the University.

"(Bomb threats) pose a problem for us because we can't jeopardize the lives of the faculty, staff and students. We must treat each (bomb threat) phone call as real."

—Charles Beckom

Beckom said this jurisdictional area is a plus to his department.

In special cases, however, jurisdiction can be extended. Beckom said Kansas law allows an officer to pursue any lawbreaker outside his jurisdiction.

All traffic summons are issued under state statutes and are usually brought before the District Court. Beckom said the University is considered outside city limits, so violators cannot be brought before a city court or arrested under city ordinances.

Beckom said one exception is noise complaints from campus areas. In these cases, the department works with an officer from the RCPD on the complaint because the complaints fall under city ordinances.

Cases involving driving under the influence and theft are also brought before the District Court.

Bomb threats are handled differently than other violations. Beckom said bomb threats are common occurrences in universities.

"Statistically, educational institutions are the primary areas for bomb threats," Beckom said.

He said bomb threats are a touchy issue because police can never be sure if a caller is serious or not.

"They pose a problem for us because we can't jeopardize the lives of the faculty, staff and students. We must treat each (bomb threat) phone call as real," he said.

Beckom said bomb threats are considered a terroristic threat and are considered a felony offense in Kansas, primarily because of the risk involved in moving a large number of people.

"When you move a large number of people to a safe place, you are going to have injuries," Beckom said.

The campus police offer a variety of special services. They offer security to President Wefald or anyone in the University. They do most of the security planning if K-State hosts dignitaries or heads of state coming for a Landon Lecture or special events.

"We have done most of the planning in the last five years," Beckom said. "This cuts down on the costs of the visiting security personnel."

They coordinate this security with different agencies, such as the Secret Service and the State Department. Beckom said when Costa Rican President Oscar Arias Sanchez was at K-State, many of the men seen were not Secret Service men but rather officers from the campus police.

The department has 20 commissioned officers and about 15 to 25 student workers who help fill in. Two to five officers are on duty at any one time. Beckom said student ticket writers and student guards in the buildings serve an important function.

"They offer the officer the latitude to do other functions. It is hard for just 20 officers to do all the functions necessary (on campus 24 hours a day)," Beckom said.

Jian Wang, a feature cellist with the Central Philharmonic Orchestra of China, performs in McCain Auditorium Tuesday evening. The orchestra is the first major Chinese orchestra to appear in this country.

Orchestra sparkles

Musicians evoke emotions

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Collegian Reporter

The Central Philharmonic Orchestra of China brought the sound of emotion to McCain Auditorium Tuesday night through the music of Verdi, Elgar and Shostakovich.

Concert Review

Under Zuohang Chen's expressive and articulate direction, the orchestra performed Giuseppe Verdi's dramatic and contrasting Overture to La forza del destino, an opera, Sir Edward Elgar's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in E minor, op. 85, and Dmitri Shostakovich's sometimes powerful, sometimes reflective Symphony No. 5 in D minor, the main theme of which is the making of a man.

"I saw man with all his experience in the center of the composition, which is lyrical in form from beginning to end," Shostakovich wrote of this symphony.

Jian Wang was the featured cello soloist for Elgar's Cello Concerto. Often referred to as Elgar's "war requiem," the Cello Concerto is one of his final masterpieces, composed after World War I.

Elgar, who was British, was greatly affected by World War I, because many of his friends were German and Elgar believed he owed much of his success to Germany. The war left him despairing and disillusioned toward the supposedly civilized values that he and the late Victorian and Edwardian generations had adhered to, and much of his emotions of confusion and despair were manifested in the Cello Concerto.

As the soloist, Wang executed skill and sensitivity in interpreting the emotions of Elgar. Whether through deep, strident chords or low, sweet melodies, Wang never fails in communicating the reflection and poignancy of Elgar's work.

The crowd showed its appreciation of the orchestra at the end of the program with a standing ovation.

The orchestra surprised the crowd before beginning the regularly scheduled program by first performing the national anthem of the United States followed by the national anthem of China.

A second treat of the night came in the form of the two encores the orchestra awarded the crowd for its generous applause and standing ovation. The first encore consisted of the light-hearted Chinese symphonic composition "What a Wonderful Evening," and the second was a delightfully frivolous arrangement of the "Chicken Reel" that looked as if it was as much fun to play as it was to listen to.

Esther Myers, a doctoral student in hotel, restaurant and institutional management, enjoyed the performance.

"It's a shame the seats aren't filled," she said.

The performance Tuesday was one of three performances that were videotaped by Jerry Schultz, from the Center for Asian Studies at the University of Kansas, and Dave Kendall, from KTWU Channel 11. Kendall and Schultz are co-producing a documentary on Chen and the tour.

Chen conducted the KU symphony for two years before returning to China last year.

Schultz and Kendall received a $3,500 grant from the Kansas Arts Commission for the project, an amount which allowed them to travel to Ames, Iowa, Lawrence and Manhattan to film the orchestra.

Kendall said the program will probably not be aired until next spring on Channel 11 because of a backlog of other video projects. Kendall said they hoped to eventually get the production broadcast on the Public Broadcasting System.

Drummers ready for national contest

Percussion section heads for St. Louis

Bruce Major, assistant instructor of music, listens to the precision of the combined percussionists during an afternoon rehearsal.

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

Some K-State students are spending more than 20 hours a week not in class, not on schoolwork and not earning a living. They are preparing for a national competition.

The 22 members in the percussion section of the KSU marching band are "really psyched" about their upcoming performance at the International Convention of the Percussive Arts Society, said Darin Baldwin, sophomore in engineering technology.

The convention will be Thursday and Friday in St. Louis.

David Roth, junior in musical performance, said the section averages about 20 hours per week practicing. Last week, the group had an 8-hour practice one day.

Since the beginning of the semester, the percussion section has been practicing two hours a day with the entire marching band, one hour a day in their individual percussion groups and three hours every Wednesday night at dress rehearsals, Roth said. The band has also spent several hours sewing part of their costumes for the competition.

"We have to fit practices in when people can come," Baldwin said. "We've had practices at some unusual times like 11:30 at night."

Stan Finck, assistant professor of music and adviser of the band, entered the drum line in the convention for the first time because it is finally located nearby and is on a weekend when there is no home football game.

The drum section is one of 10 in the country to have been selected for the yearly function.

"We are doing this mainly to get all the students to the convention because all the big-name percussion people will be there," Finck said.

He said Steve Smith, former drummer for Journey; Alan White, drummer for YES; Sam Denov, cymbalist for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; and Gordon Stout, one of the world's leading marimba soloists, are among the professional percussionists participating in the event.

Collegian/Jennifer Quist

Jari Webber, freshman undeclared, and Mike Holston, sophomore in mathematics, practice with the drum line near McCain Auditorium in

Roth, who plans to enter a master's program in music and eventually be a member of a symphony, said the chance to meet the professionals will be a good opportunity.

"The actual convention is a big deal to me," Roth said. "I'm excited to see them (the professionals) and to see what is going on outside of Manhattan and outside of Kansas."

"People are going to see different things there. It (the convention) will broaden everyone's horizons."

The convention consists of lectures, clinics, concerts, panel discussions, exhibits and the actual competition.

One of the bands which K-State is watching carefully is North Texas State, a school known for its music, Roth said. North Texas State has won the competition the last three years.

"Our line is unique because we have one music major out of the entire line," Roth said. "North Texas will probably have 25 people out there and they'll all be music majors."

"To go we have to have hope that we have a chance (of winning)," Baldwin said.

preparation for their upcoming performance at the International Convention of the Percussive Arts Society in St. Louis.

The music they will be performing was arranged by Dino Riccio, a former student of Finck's at the University of Wisconsin at Whitewater, who now runs a music store in Orlando, Fla.

"People 'Ooohh' and 'Aaahh' when other bands come here and play because they sound so tight," Roth said. "But that is because they play music that is below their level."

"At K-State, we pick music above our level, a little harder than we should, but it's for our own benefit. Most people don't know if percussion music is difficult or not, but at the competition the judges will know it is difficult and that'll help us in the scoring."

"The Stranger" and "Big Man on Mulberry Street" by Billy Joel will be performed by the percussion section, as well as "Flamenco," a jazz number by Chick Corea.

"It (the music) is real difficult," Roth said, "and it will be more difficult than the music the other bands play."

Bruce Major, assistant instructor of music, who is in charge of the percussion's front line, said the band had its final rehearsal at the Central States Marching Band Festival Saturday.

Forensics: For the thrill of it 30 K-State students participate

By Karen Allen
Collegian Reporter

The thrill of competition is one of many reasons why 30 students have chosen to participate in K-State Forensics this year.

"I'm addicted to it," said Jon Mertz, senior in speech and squad president. Mertz became involved in high school debate and has been competing for eight years.

"I like to compete and perform, but in forensics you don't have the pressure of memorizing a two-hour play," he said.

There are 11 national events in forensics, Mertz said, adding that performance time for each event is less than 10 minutes. Events include poetry, prose, extemporaneous and informative speaking.

"Communication skills are vital," he said. "You learn how to present your ideas and how to handle yourself in front of people. It is challenging."

The idea of giving speeches attracted Lara Dillinger, sophomore in secondary education.

"Forensics deals with speaking and traveling," she said. "You learn how to deal with different people in different situations."

Dillinger said the highlight of her forensic's career was traveling to San Diego, Calif., last year for the American Forensic Association's National

Terry Smith, freshman in business administration and management, became involved in high school forensics after being sidelined by a football injury.

"I had to do something," he said. "I'm very outgoing and I really enjoy talking with people."

Smith said forensics has taught him how to use the library for research.

"You become more aware of what's going on outside of your own little personal world," he said.

Smith is excited about this year's squad and said he is "looking to have a good season."

Director of Forensics Lynne Ross, speech instructor, shares Smith's enthusiasm.

"I'm really excited about our squad this year," she said. "The energy the freshman have added to our program is fantastic, and I'm looking forward to watching this group develop into a powerful team."

The squad successfully swept two tournaments in October. Third-place trophies were earned at the Bethel and St. Louis University tournaments.

"This year's team has exceptional depth and breadth," said Nancy Goulden, senior coach. "In many cases, different students won trophies and all the students contributed to sweeps points."

Hayden may run for 1990 governorship

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Although he hasn't announced any such plans yet, Gov. Mike Hayden sounded Tuesday as if he is looking forward to a campaign for re-election in 1990.

Hayden discussed recent speculation about possible Democratic challengers in the state's next gubernatorial contest with reporters during a Statehouse news conference. Among

He also said speculation may be fueled by the fact that the Democrats controlled the governorship for 16 of 20 years before his election in 1986. Democrats have said that Hayden is politically vulnerable because he failed to get a highway improvement program through the Legislature during a special session that ended in September.

ly, they're feeling on the outs right now. Most of them are kind of feeling their oats, sending up trial balloons."

Hayden also said he has no plans to commission any polls this year to measure his popularity with voters. When asked if he thought he could beat Carlin or Slattery, he said, "Let me say the race we ran last time (in 1986) is a testimonial to the kind of race we'll run."

However, Hayden said, "Obviously,

K-Stater to be Dole's new state director

By The Collegian Staff

Ron Wineinger, 1986 K-State graduate, will start his new job Monday as state director of Sen. Robert Dole's senatorial office.

The former national president of the Future Farmers of America and graduate in agricultural economics has worked as agricultural assistant in Dole's Washington office before taking the job as state director. He will work from the Wichita headquarters.

Robert Borthwick, public relations secretary for the Wichita office, said Dole had met Wineinger previously at the national convention of Future Farmers of America.

Borthwick said Dole was pleased with Wineinger and even mentioned his name during a speech at the convention. Borthwick believed this early meeting with Dole helped Wineinger to get the state director job. In addition, he said, Wineinger is qualified because he is a native Kansan.

"Ron brings sound Washington experience to the position in the Wichita office and a particularly strong background in business and agriculture," Dole said.

Borthwick said Wineinger's job in Wichita will be somewhat like "Dole's liaison, in-state."

Wineinger will be responsible for case work — such as dealing with problems people may have with social security.

His main concern will be helping the senator keep in touch with the issues concerning Kansas and helping to solve any problems that may arise for Kansans, Borthwick said.

Howard Hughes Medical Institute Doctoral Fellowships in Biological Sciences

Howard Hughes Medical Institute will award 60 Doctoral Fellowships in an international competition administered by the National Research Council. The Institute welcomes all qualified applicants and strongly encourages members of minority groups and women to apply.

Eligibility:
Applicants may be citizens or nationals of the United States or foreign nationals. Awards will be made for research-based doctoral programs in cell biology and regulation, immunology, genetics, neuroscience, and structural biology. Applicants must not have completed, including the current term, more than 24 semester hours, 36 quarter hours, or equivalent, of graduate study. Individuals who are pursuing or who hold the M.D., D.M., or D.B.S. degree and want to work toward a Ph.D. or S.D. in the biological sciences are exempt from the foregoing restriction. Foreign nationals for whom English is not the primary language must submit scores from the Test of English as a Foreign Language (TOEFL).

Stipend & Allowances:
The fellowships will be for three years, renewable for two additional years at the Institute's option. Each award includes an annual stipend of $12,300 (for 12-month tenures) to the Fellow, and an annual cost-of-education allowance of $10,700 in lieu of all tuition and fees.

Deadlines:
Deadline for Preliminary Applications is November 13, 1987. Awards will be announced in March 1988. Awardees must begin fellowships by Fall 1988.

Wildcat redshirts wait their turn, look to the future

Madden anticipates 'top caliber' schedule

By Bill Lang
Sports Writer

For Antoine Dulan and Curtis Madden, freshmen redshirts on the K-State football team, a year to prepare is just what the doctor ordered.

While the 'Cats have suffered through an 0-7 season, Dulan, Madden and the rest of the redshirts have had to sit on the sidelines, wondering how they could contribute.

"I feel I could make an impact if I could suit up for any game," Dulan, freshman in arts and sciences, said. "I've seen some of the backs make some mistakes, but I feel I have enough confidence in my ability that I could do the team some good."

"I know that's easy to say from the sidelines," he added. "But everyone of us who is redshirted believes he can make an impact."

Madden, a freshman in arts and sciences, said the redshirt program has been a benefit not only in self-conditioning, but also in developing the team aspect.

"Since I've arrived I've actually lost weight," said Madden who has dropped seven pounds to 215. "Actually I trimmed my weight down and have gotten in better shape."

"As a group though, the redshirts have become one big family," he added. "We've set goals on what we want to do in the future and plan on making sure we live up to them."

Dulan expressed the same on how the redshirts viewed their situation. "We see some of the mistakes that happen on the field," he said. "The redshirts try and see them so we can learn what will work and what won't on the field.

"As a whole, we've become really close," he said. "We try and do things together and keep in mind what we have to do to prepare for next season."

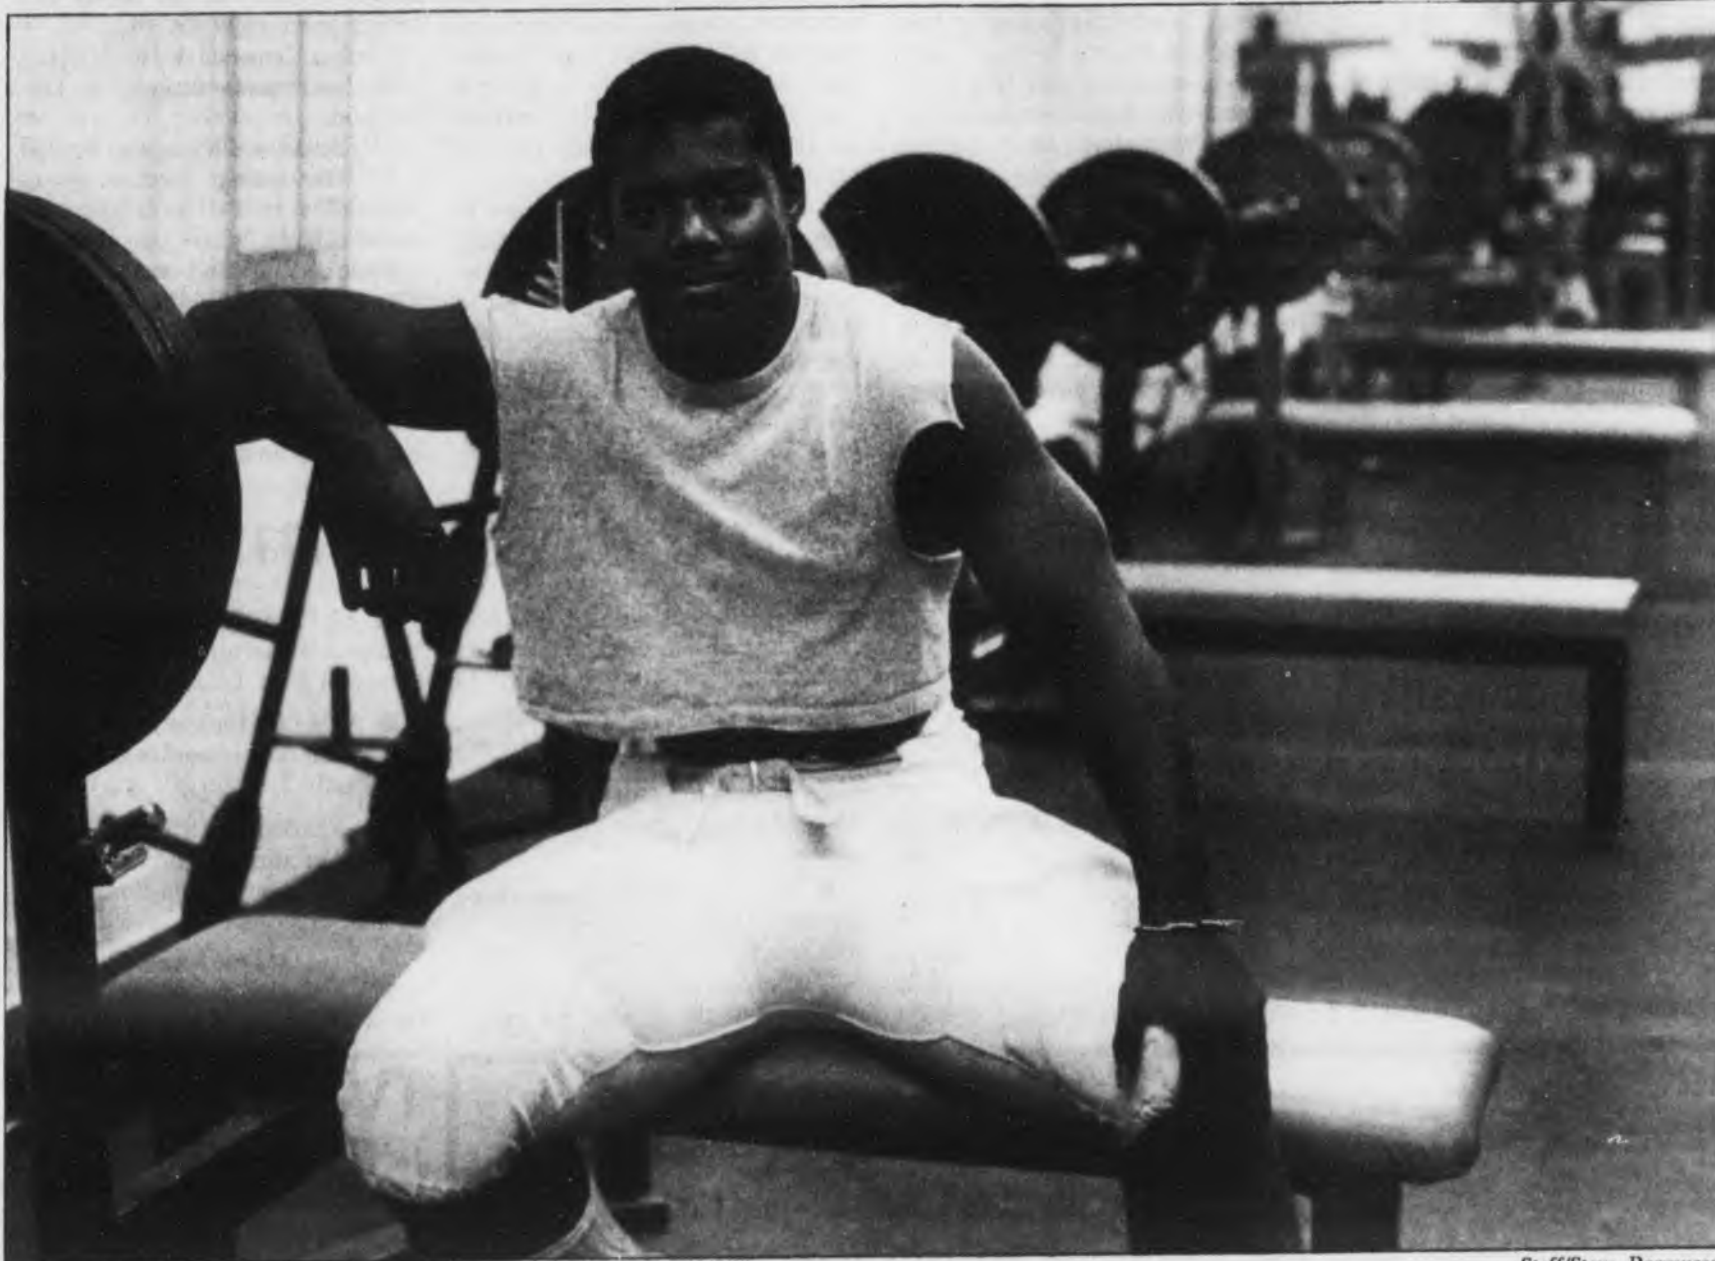

Dulan, though, is an exception in the redshirt status. It was announced last spring that due to Proposition 48 — an academic requirement policy for incoming athletes — he would be forced to sit out this year, losing a year of eligibility in the process.

"It was kind of hard to accept the news (of his status) at first," he said. "I also knew that I would have to be bigger in order to play major college football. Right now I've brought my weight up from 163 to 180. I know I could have played this year, but right now I have to concentrate on my school work and getting in shape for spring drills."

Proposition 48 states that a player coming out of high school must have 2.00 cumulative grade-point average and score 115 on their ACT (American College Aptitude Test) to be eligible for play his freshman year.

Dulan said sitting out this year has helped him get his academics in order for the future.

"I've been putting in a lot of study time so far this fall," he said. "I wish I had a little more free time. My days usually consist of going to school for the full day, then coming out to the stadium, working out for two hours and then going back home and studying until about 9:30 or 10:00 at night."

Staff/Steve Rasmussen

Curtis Madden, freshman in arts and sciences, undeclared, believes being red shirted has been beneficial to him. Madden is looking forward

For some of the redshirts, though, the hardest game to sit out will be the upcoming confrontation, Nov. 7, with the University of Kansas Jayhawks.

Don't say that to Madden, though. "The reason I came here is because I had the chance to play against top caliber teams like Nebraska, Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and Colorado," to Big Eight action so he can play against some of the top teams in the country next season.

he said. "Those games mean a lot just like the KU game. I've heard during the KU game the stadium gets really crowded and the air is really electric. "It's kind of funny," the Denison, Texas, native said. "I'm not from Kansas and I don't understand why everyone puts so much emphasis on this one game. How about the other games?"

Chiefs' head coach delivers message: 'Get tough or get out'

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Frank Gansz, whose popularity among players was a key factor in his being named head coach of the Kansas City Chiefs, is taking a 1-5 record into battle against the Chicago Bears this week and figures the time has come to get tough.

"Those guys that don't play hard aren't going to be here," the first-year head coach said Tuesday at the Chiefs media luncheon. "They just won't be playing. You better play hard or you're not going to be around here anymore."

The Chiefs, 1-1 before the strike and 0-3 during it, absorbed a 42-21 shelling Sunday by the San Diego Chargers.

In their first game since the strike, the Chiefs' regulars fell behind 28-0, collected 141 yards in penalties, had three turnovers and generally played one of the poorest games since the late '70s when Lamar Hunt's NFL entry was winning only once or twice a year.

The Chiefs will be two-touchdown underdogs at Chicago Sunday and a loss would just about doom their season. Gansz admitted his regulars were rusty, but did not feel rust was their only problem.

"Here's what happened," he said. "Some guys played well. Some guys didn't. Some guys did their job. Some didn't. But it's a team. And in team games, one flaw will get you killed."

Asked if the players who gave full effort resented those who did not, Gansz said, "I sure would."

"I would think you'd be concerned," he said. "I'm sure the guys who want to win badly are. That's a helluva lot of work to put in. I'm disappointed in the play of a number of people on this football team."

Gansz also said he would announce several lineup changes Wednesday.

"I don't want to announce it until after I've talked to the players first, and that will be Wednesday morning," he said. "There will be several. I told the team this — either they play, or they're out of here."

Gansz was an assistant coach for the Chiefs during the 1982 season when they came back from the 57-day strike and played so poorly they got head coach Marv Levy fired.

"I'm not going to go through what I went through in 1982 when we came back from a strike. I'm not going to go through that again. Winning has to be on their mind. Football has to be on their mind. I want them to be concerned about winning around the clock."

Four first-year players who had been on injured reserve since training camp were waived Tuesday by the Kansas City Chiefs.

They are linebackers James Lee of Baylor and Charles Merritt of Carson-Newman, and offensive tackles Bill Schick of Wisconsin and Tim Stone of K-State.

'Cat baseball team scores for Big Lakes

By Jackie Wendt
Collegian Reporter

Wildcat hitters "batted 1,000" with some special people at Big Lakes Developmental Center Inc. this season.

Sigma Chi fraternity, Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority and the K-State baseball team all worked together on a program in which Big Lakes received money for each run the baseball team scored during its recently completed fall season.

Susan M. Frady, Community Relations Coordinator for Big Lakes, said that Sigma Chi and Sigma Sigma Sigma went to businesses and other fraternities and sororities and took pledges on a per run basis for Big Lakes. Each group that was approached was asked to pledge any amount they wished for each run.

In addition, Frady said the baseball team handed out pledge sheets when they parked cars at a K-State football game.

Frady said the money will go into a fund to help some 175 physically, mentally or developmentally delayed individuals in Pottawatomie, Riley, Geary and Clay counties.

"We have adult training centers in Manhattan and Clay Center that have contracts with businesses to do work for them, and we also have three children centers that provide developmental services to children," Frady said.

Mike Clark, head baseball coach, said he toured Big Lakes this summer and that it was his idea to start this project with Big Lakes.

"We wanted a charity that was run well and was well thought of, and with Big Lakes we found it," Clark said. "Hopefully, we'll be able to use the money to expand the program."

Clark said the project started on Sept. 12 and ended when the Wildcat baseball season was over on Oct. 24.

"We're using healthy bodies and healthy minds to help those less fortunate. It's a great program," Clark said.

Clark estimated in mid-October that over $1,000 had been raised so far and that the team had been "scoring a fantastic amount of runs."

"We're averaging 11 or 12 runs per game and so we'd like to see over $2,000 raised by the end," Clark said.

Camping is great, but is it best way?

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM PERRIN
Sports
Columnist

Don't get me wrong, camping out for basketball tickets is an absolutely swell tradition. It shows great spirit on the part of the student body toward the basketball program and all that other kind of rah-rah college stuff.

Nonetheless, after seeing some people camp out for over a week and still get stuck with crappy tickets for the entire season, I figured there's got to be a better way. In search of that better way, I gave the people a call at the University of Kansas athletic ticket office to see what their procedure is.

And, much as I hate to give KU credit for anything worthwhile, they do have a far saner method of allocating student tickets than we do here at good ol' K-State.

KU has a concept it calls the "all-sports ticket." This ticket, which also works for admittance to KU football and the Kansas Relays, entitles the student purchaser to pick up a set of individual general admission tickets at the start of the basketball season, according to Laura Klotz, a clerk in the KU ticket office. The cost is $60.

Beginning May 1 of each year 7,500 all-sports tickets are available to students. All students, including incoming freshmen, are given an equal opportunity to buy these tickets. All returning students for the following fall semester are mailed a ticket order form over the summer and freshmen get forms at orientation. This year, all 7,500 all-sports tickets were gone by the second day of enrollment, Klotz said.

No cold nights of camping out and nobody has reason to be unhappy. Not a bad deal.

Coincidentally, with the 7,500 number, 7,500 out of the 15,800 seats at Allen Fieldhouse are allocated to students. All of these seats are general admission, so that means that if you don't mind arriving early on a game-by-game basis, you'll get a good seat.

Granted, coming early to basketball games week after week is somewhat of an inconvenience. But, compared to spending two weeks of your life living in a tent, it doesn't sound half bad.

The idea of having all student tickets be general admission is a good one too. This way, the best and loudest fans (who typically arrive early at the games anyway), are close to the court and can begin harassing the opposition as they take their first warm-up shots.

The one bad part of the KU plan is that it forces the student to buy tickets to watch the pathetic Jayhawk football team in order to see the powerhouse basketball team.

If K-State should decide to implement a similar proposal, it should keep separate the basketball and football tickets. Some people who are basketball fans may not necessarily enjoy football and vice versa.

OK, there's the plan. Everybody has equal opportunity to get good seats and nobody, aside from people who would have to skip class once or twice to wait in line, can complain. Along with the new Fred Bramlage Coliseum, K-State deserves a new and improved student basketball ticket policy as well.

Sports Briefly

Hughes may be lost again

While terming his team's practice Monday as a "good, spirited workout," K-State football coach Stan Parrish was perhaps more concerned about the condition of starting wide receiver Dan Hughes, who reinjured an ankle during the drills.

Parrish was not sure of the extent of Hughes' injury or when he might return to the Wildcat lineup. Hughes had just recently returned to action after missing three games earlier this season due to injuries.

While Hughes' condition was uncertain, Parrish did mention defensive back Marcus Miller returned to practice after suffering a dislocated shoulder in the Oklahoma game two weeks ago. Also, offensive lineman Rob Goode is expected to be back to practice today after being on the injured list.

Miller receives AAU award

Diana Miller, a freshman basketball player at K-State University, has been selected as the Most Outstanding Junior Olympic Athlete for the 18 and under age group in the Missouri Valley Amateur Athletic Union.

Miller was selected by the women's basketball committee of the Missouri Valley AAU for her play in the AAU Tournament held in Manhattan last spring.

The award will be presented to Miller on Sunday, Nov. 1, at a banquet in Kansas City. The banquet will have athletes from all the participating sports in attendance.

"It is a great honor for Diana to have been chosen out of all the people in Kansas who participated in the AAU Tournament," K-State Head Coach Matilda Mossman said. "Diana has worked hard and is very deserving of this award."

Miller joins the Lady Cats after an all-state performance at Buhler High School in Hutchinson. The all-time leading scorer at Buhler, she was selected to the Converse All-America basketball team.

Basketball banquet planned

Tickets are still available for the K-State Alumni Basketball Banquet on Nov. 20. The event, which will be held at the K-State Student Union, is open to the public.

The evening will begin at 6:30 p. m., with a social hour, to be followed by the banquet at 7:30 p. m.

Featured speakers for the banquet include the five coaches to lead the Wildcats in Ahearn Field House — Jack Gardner, Tex Winter, Cotton Fitzsimmons, Jack Hartman and Lon Kruger.

Tickets for the evening are $15 each, and may be purchased from the K-State Basketball Office. For more information, call (913) 532-6531.

Top NL skipper named

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bob "Buck" Rodgers, who guided the Montreal Expos to a surprising third-place finish in the National League East this season, has been named NL Manager of the Year, the Baseball Writers Association of America announced Tuesday.

Rodgers, in his third season as manager of the Expos, received 92 points from a 24-man committee of the BBWAA, easily beating San Francisco's Roger Craig, the runner-up with 65 points.

Rodgers, the only manager named on all ballots, collected 13 first-place votes, eight for second and three for third. Points were awarded on a 5-3-1 basis.

Senators urge FAA to adopt drug testing

By The Associated Press
WASHINGTON — Missouri and Kansas senators urged the head of the Federal Aviation Administration on Tuesday to move ahead quickly with a regulatory proposal for random drug testing of airline workers.
Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., and Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., complained in a letter to FAA Administrator T. Allan McArtor that the agency had not issued a proposed regulation for the drug-testing program, which was announced last January.
"Congress was led to believe that the FAA would move expeditiously on this extremely important issue of public safety," the senators wrote. "At this time, the promise of action remains unfulfilled."
Former Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, before she resigned to campaign for her husband's presidential effort, said she expected the agency to issue its proposed regulation this fall. She also expressed disappointment that Congress had not approved legislation requiring broader drug-testing programs in the airline, trucking and railroad industries.

The Senate Commerce Committee, on which Danforth and Kassebaum serve, approved a drug-testing bill last March but it has not been considered on the Senate floor. Labor unions have opposed the legislation and have launched court battles to block drug testing programs in government agencies.
Even if the Transportation Department issues its proposed aviation drug-testing regulation this fall, agency officials have said a final rule probably will not be ready until next year.

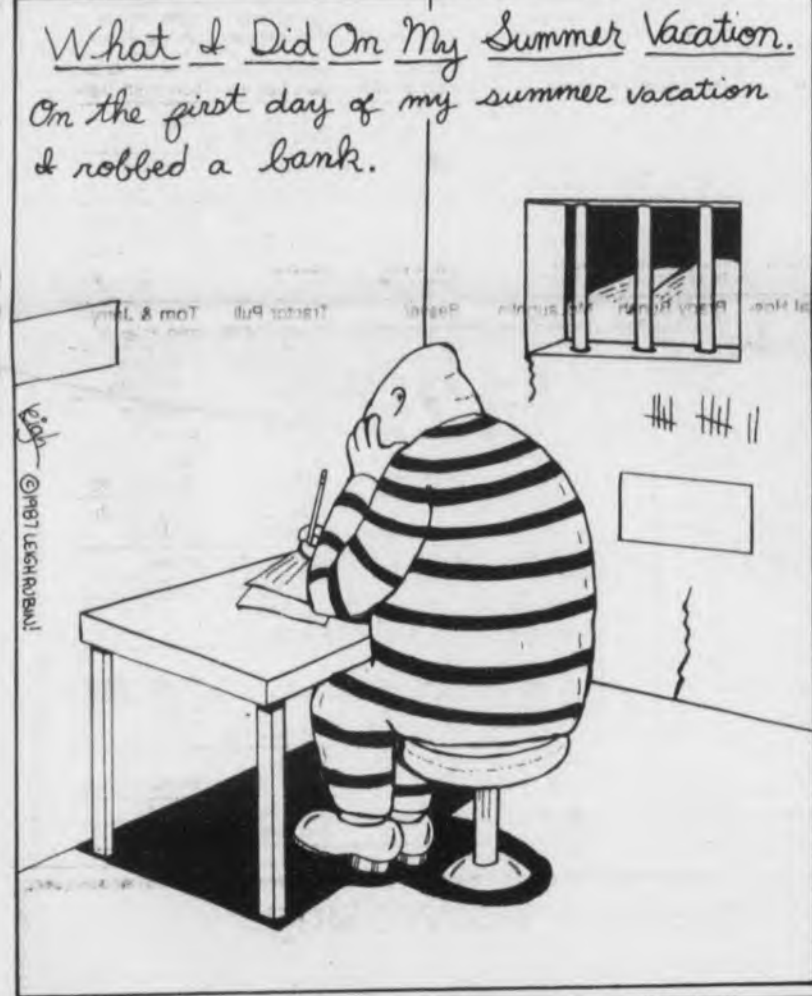

Stocks

Tuesday, with some money heading back into equities, breaking a trend that had helped depress stock prices since the devastating 508-point drop in the Dow on Oct. 19.
Another factor pushing the Dow higher was an announcement by International Business Machines that it would spend an additional $1 billion to buy back its own stock. IBM, one of the 30 companies in the Dow average, rose $6.50 a share to $118.50.
The market paid scant attention to news from Washington that orders to factories for "big ticket" durable goods rose 1.1 percent in September, the first increase since June.

The biggest problem facing Wall Street, analysts said, remains a lack of confidence, both in the market itself after last week's $500 billion collapse and in the ability of the White House and Congress to trim the federal budget deficit.
"Until we get something really concrete (on the budget), people are going to be doubtful," said Ralph Acampora, an analyst with Kidder Peabody & Co. He warned, "The market will wait for no man."
In Washington, President Reagan and congressional leaders were optimistic negotiations would result in a plan to cut the deficit. Reagan said Tuesday the stock market plunge "has alerted us of potential dangers on the economic horizon."

Stranded woman's parents ask leaders to implement rescue

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The parents of a Lawrence woman believed stranded with about 150 other tourists on a snow-bound highway in the Himalayas prodded officials Tuesday into mounting rescue efforts amid reports the trapped travelers were in urgent need of help.

The State Department announced in Washington later in the day that most of the tourists who had been trapped in a snowstorm at 16,000 feet since Oct. 19 had made their way back to Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, or to the Tibetan market town of Jihkatsa.

Six to 10 of the travelers remained in Tingri West, the area in Tibet near the Nepalese border where the tourists traveling aboard buses had been marooned, the State Department said. Other officials warned that it was not clear that all of the tourists were out of danger.

The parents of Emily Hill, a 19-year-old Dartmouth College student from Lawrence, awaited word on the fate of their daughter.

Hill, along with her cousin, Chris Hill of Boulder, Colo., and their friend, Pierre Valette of Newton, Mass., were believed to have been among the stranded travelers who had been headed from Lhasa to Nepal.

Word of the tourists' predicament became known after about a half-dozen of the travelers hiked for five days into Nepal to seek help.

"Many of the people stuck there had no warm clothes. They had no food except some champa (millet flour) and no drinking water," a Canadian, Fred Brooks, told The Associated Press in Katmandu after he walked to safety.

Upon hearing that the travelers might be freezing and starving, Emily Hill's mother, Marcia Hill, called Sen. Bob Dole's office in Washington and asked an aide to check into the possibility of the Chinese airlifting food and other supplies. In Topeka, Gov. Mike Hayden contacted the United States ambassador to Nepal.

Family friends contacted Sen. Nancy Kassebaum. Kassebaum's administrative assistant, Dave Bartel, said he called an official at the Chinese Embassy in Washington and relayed the senator's concern about the stranded tourists and asked that all possible rescue operations be mounted.

"I'm feeling better," Marcia Hill said after learning that most of the tourists had made it back to a town.

Brooks said the snowstorm struck the mountains as the vehicles were approaching the 17,384-foot-high Tungal Pass, 44 miles northwest of the friendship bridge of Sino-Nepalese border.

"So, we came out and pushed the bus. Some people ran ahead of it to show the driver the snow-covered route," Brooks said.

After driving 300 yards, the driver gave up.

"We spent the night in the bus. So did the passengers of other vehicles behind us and ahead of us," Brooks said.

The following morning the passengers awoke to find the road covered with about two feet of snow.

Local construction workers offered them some champa, or millet flour. They also dined on a sheep that had been recently slaughtered by the workers.

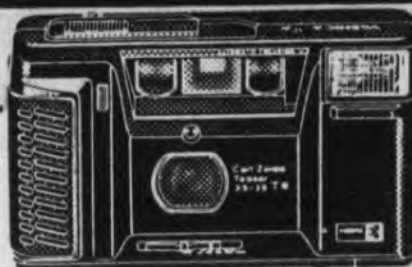

The night of Oct. 20 was cold as the mercury dropped below freezing.

The next morning, Brooks and nine other passengers — two Norwegians, two Poles, two Austrians, a Swiss, a Briton, and an Irishman — decided to leave the place on foot.

After a journey of more than 100 miles, eight men arrived in Katmandu and asked for help. Only the Poles had yet to reach Katmandu because they were having trouble walking, Brooks said.

Sacrifices made for mall

Owners dispute land appraisals

By Paula Selby
Collegian Reporter

The creation of the Manhattan Town Center was a slow process that consisted of give-and-take on all sides. For some of the businesses that sold their buildings to make way for the mall's construction, though, managers said the give outweighed the take.

"It's probably been one of the most traumatic things that I've ever done in my life. I went through two wars and it wasn't any more traumatic than that," said Paul Bosch, owner of the relocated Manhattan Auto Supply — Big A Auto Parts.

Of the 73 businesses that vacated the downtown area, 56 relocated (four of them outside city limits), 13 went out of business completely, three consolidated with established businesses and the status of one is yet to be determined.

The city used a $9 million Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) it received from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to compensate the businesses and residences that were forced to move.

The UDAG was used for acquisition and relocation compensations, allowing the city to pay for property and businesses' moving expenses.

The city also organized a Downtown Relocation Assistance Program to help compensate what the UDAG didn't cover, said Karen Davis, assistant director of the department of community development.

For example, the UDAG doesn't compensate higher rent costs in the new location. The grant also doesn't compensate for money borrowed that was used to refinance the business to construct a new building, Davis said.

Relocation compensation covered the actual costs of moving, but, Bosch said, "every time you relocate you're talking about a tremendous amount of money."

"Nobody down there really wanted to move," Davis said. "And, we didn't want them to move either, but...in order for the project to be done in the best way possible, it required that those businesses and those residences be moved out."

Said Bosch: "The costs of hiring an attorney (along with) appraisal fees were in excess of $75,000. How can you justify that in fair compensation?"

Bosch was the landlord for the auto supply at its former location and the owner of the Quality Motor Company, located downtown. He is still in court over the acquisition of that property.

The city had two certified appraisers that quoted the value of each property. If the property owners were not satisfied with the estimate, they could appeal the amount. Then, court-appointed appraisers would come up with a new figure to be awarded.

In Bosch's case, the city appealed the court-assigned appraisal. "So, it cost us somewhere in the neighborhood of 40 percent in attorney fees to even try to salvage what little we had left, as far as our awards are concerned," he said.

Another owner that resorted to the court system to get just compensation was Doug Long, owner of Mel's Tavern.

"When the city first approached me with offers, they were so unrealistic that I had to hire a lawyer from Kansas City," Long said. The increase between the first offer and the final settlement was close to 35 percent, he said.

Long owned Mel's Tavern; Bentley's, a private club also located in the downtown area; and a portion of the Dougout, a restaurant and bar located in the Old Town Mall.

He received acquisition money for Mel's after appealing to the court. The city was unable to use the UDAG money for Long's acquisition, because he owned another bar outside the designated area. Therefore, he wasn't officially out of the bar business.

Long used the relocation money for Bentley's to expand the Dougout.

"They treated me very fairly on the relocation of the club," he said.

The Fishbowl was opened by Long, since Mel's was known for its fish bowls.

"We're hopping," Long said about the new business. "We're getting all walks of life — all the way from college (students) to workers to bankers."

Jack Riley named to replace Good in Ag department

By The Collegian Staff

Jack Riley, professor of animal sciences and industry, has been selected to replace Don Good as head of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry. Good will retire Nov. 18.

"Riley was highly supported by the faculty and search committee," said Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture.

The screening and selection committee was composed of 13 members: seven faculty members from animal sciences, four members from other colleges, an extension specialist and a representative from the K-State experiment stations. Guy Kiracofe, professor of animal sciences and industry, chaired the committee.

After advertising the position and receiving 23 applications, the committee chose four candidates to interview. The interviews were conducted by administration and faculty groups, classified staff, industry groups, and graduate and undergraduate students.

The industry groups were from the Kansas Pork Producers Council, the Kansas Livestock Association, the Kansas Farm Bureau, the Meat Processors Association, the Kansas Dairy Council, the Kansas Poultry Council and others.

Each of the groups identified the candidates' strengths and weaknesses but did not rank the candidates, Kiracofe said. This information, as well as the committee's perceptions, were compiled in a final report for Woods for the final selection, he said.

"Dr. Riley is recognized nationally in his program. He is a well-known individual who interacts well (with people) in the state," Woods said. "We are pleased to have Dr. Riley as a part of the administrative team in the College of Agriculture."

The other three finalists were Bill Foley, University of West Virginia; Larry Benyshek, University of Georgia; and John Beverly, Animal Science Extension Director in Texas.

Arguments ensue during GOP debate

By The Associated Press

HOUSTON — Front-runner George Bush defended himself against repeated attacks from his 1988 campaign rivals Wednesday night as GOP presidential contenders argued arms control and taxes in a two-hour televised debate.

"It's fine when you're outside, carping, criticizing your president. It's very different when you're in there having to make the tough call," the vice president said as he returned fire.

Former Secretary of State Alexander Haig waved his finger close to Bush's face as the two argued about a prospective treaty to ban intermediate weapons. Haig opposes the treaty and Bush supports it.

Former Delaware Gov. Pierre du Pont attacked Bush sharply.

"The question is in a Bush presidency where would he lead America. So far we haven't seen any vision, any principal, any policy. We really haven't had it spelled out very successfully," he said to scattered boos from the audience.

"This debate's starting to liven up a little bit," Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole said after one heated moment. "I thought it was going to die on the vine."

Rep. Jack Kemp also assailed Bush in a veiled fashion. The New York congressman pointed out that he supported Reagan in 1980 while Bush mounted his own losing bid.

The sixth contender, television evangelist Pat Robertson, generally stayed above the sniping.

It was the first nationally televised appearance for the field, and Bush agreed reluctantly to share the stage in the special segment of PBS' "Firing Line" hosted by William F. Buckley. He decided to participate after twice declining invitations.

It soon became clear why the front-runner's rivals wanted the joint appearance.

Bush refused to cite examples of disagreements between himself and Reagan in the past seven years, and said "loyalty is a strength, not a character."

Market erratic; Dow shows slight gain

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The stock market vacillated again Wednesday but closed mostly lower as the dollar and bond markets resurfaced as factors influencing its course.

The Dow Jones industrial average finished up a scant 0.33 points at 1,846.82 following a 52.56-point gain Tuesday. The value of all stocks lost $12 billion.

In a day punctuated by erratic swings, the average fell 63 points in the first half hour, then rebounded sharply, being up as high as 35 points above Tuesday's close.

The dollar fell sharply in European trading — hitting a seven-year low against the West German mark and a five-year low against the British pound.

Despite the slight rise in the Dow, two stocks lost money for every one that advanced, while more than 279 million shares were traded in another abbreviated session on the New York Stock Exchange.

"This is a very treacherous market," said Alfred E. Goldman, a vice president at A.G. Edwards & Sons

Inc. in St. Louis. "The best thing to have is a sense of humor and cash on the sidelines."

Markets have been closing two hours early to allow people to catch up on paperwork. The shortened hours will continue through Friday.

Although there was more panic selling Wednesday, "each wave puts less pressure on the market," indicating signs of a turnaround, said Michael Metz, an analyst with Oppenheimer & Co.

While the market tossed and turned, workers on Wall Street and in brokerage firms struggled to keep a positive outlook.

"The strain is just unbelievable, the tension and the anxiety," Metz said. "It's really a very difficult environment."

In other developments Wednesday:

■ Talks to reduce the budget deficit resumed in Washington, with the White House and congressional leaders expressing optimism that they could meet their goal of $23 billion in cuts.

■ Beryl W. Sprinkel, who had announced his resignation as chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, may stay on to assist in dealing with the stock market crisis, White House spokesman Martin Fitzwater said.

Many analysts said the dollar and the bond market put downward pressure on the market.

Farmers could gain from market crash

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — While investors eye world stock markets, U.S. farmers are watching farm commodity prices amid predictions Wall Street's collapse will make things worse for agriculture.

U.S. farm income could fall $2 billion in each of the next two years despite such positive factors for agriculture as a weaker dollar and lower interest rates, Terry Franci, an economist with the Chicago-based American Farm-Bureau Federation, said Wednesday.

"The impact of lower equity values worldwide will offset whatever positive impact you get from the lower value of the dollar," Franci said.

A weaker dollar would encourage more foreign buying of U.S. farm products, and expected lower interest rates would help reduce the debt load on farmers, he said.

But a slowdown in economic growth worldwide because of a diminished pool of investment capital caused by the stock markets' plunge would cut projected farm income in 1988 and 1989 from $40 billion to $38 billion or $39 billion, Franci said.

Franci said he based his projections on the Dow Jones industrial average stabilizing near 2,000 points.

Some analysts believe the recent sell-off of stocks is a harbinger of recession, but for many farmers a recession began long ago.

"I kind of feel like now everyone's going to feel what the farmers have been going through for the last four or five years," said Rebecca Beeler, a McLean, Ill., farm wife and mother of three.

Beeler and her husband, Bill, grow soybeans and corn on their 3,000-acre farm. She said the value of their land has fallen from $4,000 to $1,800 an acre in five years.

"Our net worth has just shrunk so much that it makes things difficult for our cash flow," she said in a telephone interview. "We can't borrow as much money because we don't have as many assets."

Many Wall Street investors might make the same complaint.

Though stock prices have fallen, grain and soybean prices have been fairly stable since they plummeted along with Dow Jones industrial average Oct. 19.

Soybeans sold on the cash market.

Budget deficit shows decline

WASHINGTON — The federal budget deficit, helped by a revenue bonanza, shrank by 33 percent in the budget year which ended Sept. 30 even though the U.S. government spent $1 trillion for the first time in history, the Reagan administration reported Wednesday.

The administration's final accounting for the past budget year showed the imbalance between revenues and spending fell to $148 billion, down from the record $221.1 billion in the 1986 fiscal year.

The improvement came in a 12-month period in which the federal government spent a record $1,002 trillion, up 1.2 percent from fiscal 1986 when federal spending was $990.2 billion.

Revenues shot up at a much faster clip than spending, rising by 11.1 percent to total $854.1 billion. The increase was due in large part to higher-than-expected individual tax payments resulting from the changeover to the new tax law.

The 1987 budget figures were announced as the administration and congressional budget negotiators got down to serious bargaining which they hope will result in substantial deficit reductions aimed at calming stock market jitters over the federal government's unending flow of deficits.

There have now been deficits in 26 of the past 27 years, running up a total accumulated national debt of $2.37 trillion. Servicing that debt cost U.S. taxpayers a record $195.4 billion in 1987, up from $190.2 billion in 1986.

Reagan renews summit offer

WASHINGTON — President Reagan on Wednesday renewed his offer to host the next superpower summit meeting in the United States, but administration officials said Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev might prefer another site.

Gorbachev's reservations surfaced as the White House and the Kremlin announced that Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze would fly to Washington for talks Friday with Reagan and Secretary of State George P. Shultz.

He was expected to deliver a message from Gorbachev to Reagan, who said in a speech at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., that "it would be good for Mr. Gorbachev to see this country for himself."

But two U.S. officials, demanding anonymity, told The Associated Press separately that the Soviet leader was reluctant to have the summit held in the United States.

Iraq renews air raids on Iran

KUWAIT — Iraq said Wednesday its warplanes raided three tankers off Iran and industrial targets on the mainland. Iran threatened to answer any Western economic embargo by sealing off the Persian Gulf.

Iran also said three of its warplanes approached American warships south of the gulf in defiance of U.S. Navy warnings.

The 13th convoy of Navy vessels and reflagged Kuwaiti tankers arrived safely at the sheikdom, which has been hit by three Iranian missiles this month.

Shipping sources in the gulf said they could not confirm the attacks on tankers reported by Iraq. The Iranians indirectly confirmed bombing sorties on the mainland by saying 18 people were killed and 70 wounded in Iraqi air raids on civilian areas.

Iranian authorities vowed retaliation and warned Iraqi civilians, as they have before in the 7-year-old war, to evacuate areas near industrial and economic installations.

Safer IUD ready next year

NEW YORK — A more effective copper IUD will become available in the United States next year, two years after a wave of lawsuits and adverse publicity drove all similar birth control devices off the market.

The Population Council, a non-profit research and policy organization in New York City, said Wednesday that it had licensed GynoMed Pharmaceutical of Somerville, N.J., to market the device for the first time in the United States.

The new intrauterine device, called the Copper T 380A, was developed by researchers at the Population Council and was approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration in 1984. It has been used in other countries, including Canada, since 1982, but it has never been sold in the United States.

The Copper T 380A "is the most effective IUD available anywhere," said George Zeidenstein, president of the Population Council. Studies show that over a year's time an average of one woman out of 100 using it will get pregnant.

The agreement between the Population Council and GynoMed follows a year-long search for a company that would market the device with appropriate safety precautions, Zeidenstein said.

"We welcome the copper IUD as an important addition to the contraceptive field," Dr. Louise Tyrer of Planned Parenthood said at a news conference.

Plane lands on busy street

BARTLESVILLE, Okla. — A cargo plane with engine trouble skidded across a usually busy street during the rush hour Wednesday morning and stopped 150 yards short of a house following a wheels-up emergency landing.

The pilot and co-pilot of the twin-engine turboprop escaped with minor injuries in the 7:30 a.m. accident and no one on the ground was hurt, said Bartlesville Police Capt. John Evans. The names of the pilot and co-pilot were not released.

"Normally, that road's loaded with people. It's just a miracle that no one was killed," said Jim Edwards, assistant manager of the Bartlesville Municipal Airport.

Car used to prevent launch

WASHINGTON — The Air Force said Wednesday it was only as "an added precaution" that an armored car was hurriedly parked atop a Minuteman III silo after the nuclear missile inside gave off false signals suggesting it was about to launch itself nearly four years ago.

Capt. Bill Kalton, a public information officer at F. E. Warren Air Force Base in Cheyenne, Wyo., said the vehicle "would have fallen on top of the missile and prevented it from going any place" if a launch had occurred.

A spokesman for the Strategic Air Command, Capt. Phillip Delaney, added: "The malfunction was such an unusual occurrence that (missile wing) officials decided to take that step (with the vehicle) as an added precaution."

The incident at a missile site on the Nebraska-Wyoming border happened on Jan. 10, 1984. Fifteen days later, SAC made a brief announcement. The Casper, Wyo. Star Tribune published further details this week, including the use of the armored car to block a firing missile.

Then and now, SAC stressed that there was no danger to the public and no chance that its ballistic nuclear missiles could accidentally launch themselves.

"There was absolutely no way a Minuteman missile could have been accidentally launched," Delaney said.

Volunteers to aid Kansas K-State students to participate

By Jackie Brazzle
Collegian Reporter

Student volunteers will be chosen in the coming weeks to help the U.S. Department of Education and K-State implement a community service program to help rural Kansas communities.

The community service program has four components, but it is the first of these components — the creation of eight teams of 30-40 undergraduates from all disciplines to work in rural Kansas communities — that K-State is concentrating on now, said Carol Peak, director of the community service program.

Peak said the program is intended to provide students with the opportunity to do community service work while using their academic knowledge and skills in a meaningful way.

"They (students) will be putting their education to work firsthand to help solve community problems and decreasing their indebtedness at the same time," Peak said.

Participants in the program will receive a $1,500 stipend and a $400 scholarship when the project is completed.

Peak said this is a plus because the communities will be providing such things as housing and transportation.

In addition to the financial benefit, students gain a marvelous educational opportunity by learning to make their skills mesh with others on the team, she said. There is also a psychological benefit.

"Students get a reward from providing something that is needed," Peak said.

The program also gives the students who have never lived in a rural community the chance to see and work in one, she said, adding that someday the students may want to return to the community to live or work.

Peak said the students will be doing a variety of projects in eight communities, which include Goodland, Oberlin, Wallace County, Paola, Onaga and the North Central Regional Planning Commission in Beloit. Two other communities will be named to participate in the program.

The communities and K-State will also benefit from the program, she said. Peak said the communities are looking forward to having students come in and help them.

"This program is a way for them to make contact with the University and to make use of the skills available to them here," she said.

"They (students) will be putting their education to work firsthand to help solve community problems and decreasing their indebtedness at the same time."

—Carol Peak

Many rural Kansas communities are facing severe hardships and many of the towns could use an "extra pair of hands," said Marvin Kaiser, head of the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work.

The program is a good public relations tool for K-State because it involves only K-State students, Peak said.

The University hopes to have 1500 students and 66 communities participating in the program by 1993, Peak said.

"We plan to keep expanding at all levels," she said.

The program's other three components are:

- a campus clearinghouse to coordinate volunteers and community requests for assistance;

- a Home Owners Maintenance and Energy project (H.O.M.E.) to help the low-income elderly and handicapped;

- and a special fund to finance other community assistance projects students want to undertake.

Peak said the heads of the program will identify the different specialties and skills needed in the students and the eight communities by the end of this week.

Department heads will then receive a notice on how students should apply and what kind of students the program is looking for. She said this will be a campuswide effort.

"We are encouraging applications from everyone who is interested," Peak said.

Fort Hays requests increase in funding

By The Associated Press

FORT HAYS — Fort Hays State University President Edward Hammond urged a legislative committee Wednesday to increase funding for the school to bring it to the level of its peer institutions.

Hammond, who has been president of Fort Hays for five months, told the Joint Ways and Means Committee that "people of western Kansas don't understand why their institution is not funded as much as institutions in the eastern part of the state."

New vaccine may prevent typhoid fever

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — A new penny-a-dose vaccine can largely prevent typhoid fever, one of the world's most common diseases, without causing side effects that have undermined efforts at controlling the illness, researchers say.

In tests in Nepal, the vaccine was 75 percent effective in stopping the disease, which is a major cause of fever and death in many underdeveloped parts of the world. According to one estimate, the disease strikes 50 million people annually.

Dr. Julie Parsonette of the division of bacterial disease at the Centers for Disease Control said the risk of typhoid is greatest in Asia, South America and Africa. Between 1982 and 1984, Peru reported the highest incidence of the disease, with 173 cases reported per million residents.

"The thing I find exciting is the possibility that one could go into a defined population and, if not eradicate, at least enormously reduce the amount of typhoid fever, even without addressing issues like safe water supply," said Dr. Charles U. Lowe, who organized testing of the vaccine.

Unlike many vaccines, this new vaccine does not require refrigeration or other special handling, and doctors using injection guns could give 1,200 shots per hour.

Typhoid fever is caused by a form of bacteria that is spread through food and water tainted with sewage.

Experts say that besides helping to bring the disease under control in parts of the world that lack sewage systems and clean drinking water, the vaccine could also protect travelers who visit such places.

"We appear to have a good typhoid vaccine," commented Dr. Richard Krause, dean of Emory University Medical School.

The vaccine was developed by Dr. John B. Robbins and colleagues at the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development.

Banning is no answer; CIA deserves equality

Today is the first day the Central Intelligence Agency will be conducting job interviews on campus. At other universities, students have staged protests — violent and non-violent — to ban the CIA from interviewing.

Although K-State students have an inherent right to protest against the CIA, they should make no attempt to ban the CIA from interviewing on campus.

The students at other universities — including the University of Iowa, where 30 students were arrested while recently protesting against the CIA — have protested against the agency on the grounds the organization is guilty of committing crimes against humanity and should not be allowed to interview on campuses.

The courts have allowed some protestors to use this as a defense, such as Amy Carter and Abbie Hoffman, who protested at Brown University.

Surely there will be protests here, and students are encouraged to exercise their First Amendment rights of freedom of speech and peaceful assembly. But a ban of the CIA would be unfair to those wishing to interview for jobs.

Whether or not the CIA's actions can be condoned is a matter up to each individual. Although the agency's actions are, in fact, highly questionable, the same could undoubtedly be said about a number of companies that conduct interviews at K-State. Denying one company or agency the privilege to interview would insult students' intelligence.

For example, Dow Chemical made millions of dollars off a little product which proved quite popular with the armed forces in Vietnam. The product was called Napalm. It was often found being dropped on civilian villages in the Vietnamese countryside.

The CIA does not spend most of its time overthrowing democratic, mildly leftist, third world governments in order to place the most authoritarian, anti-communist army colonel it can find in power. Most employees spend their time doing what most bureaucrats do, writing reports and trying to make the next step on the government pay scale.

Anyone who deems the CIA's actions to be unbecoming of a government agency has the right to protest and the right to refuse to interview. Conversely, anyone with few or no qualms about the CIA's actions has the right to interview and the right to refuse to protest.

The rights of those both for and against the CIA must be protected.

All students should work for more funds

Warning bells have been sounding lately about the effect a lack of funding has on the quality of education in Kansas.

All seven Regents schools have been working to obtain more state funding and have recently developed the "Margin of Excellence" program to bring extra funding into the university system. The goal is to obtain $47 million in state money to bring the schools up to the level of their peer institutions in other states. Currently, Regents schools are funded at about 85 percent compared to those other institutions.

Here at K-State, lobbying efforts have been left to people like President Jon Wefald, Student Body President Kent Bradley, and other administrative and student leaders. So far this lobbying has been pretty low-key, with the exception of programs like HERO — Higher Education Rescue Operation.

The stakes in this funding gamble are high. Funding decisions made in the near future could affect the quality of education at K-State for a very long time. Also, the amount of effort schools show in competing for funding of any kind could determine the amount of money they receive in the future. Showing a willingness to fight for quality education might prove to be one of the most important factors in funding decisions, especially if the "Margin of Excellence" program is adopted and funded by the state.

Students at the University of Kansas have begun just such an active lobbying effort. Student and administrative leaders there have begun a letter-writing campaign to Gov. Mike Hayden to pressure him for extra funding for their school. So far, more than 500 letters — most of them handwritten — have been received in the governor's office. In the letters, students express their dissatisfaction with the decline in the quality of education at KU since the university experienced a decline in funding and an increase in enrollment.

This is the type of aggressive lobbying K-State students should consider when leaders sit down to think of ways to get more money from the state. Extra funding should require extra effort, not only from student leaders and representatives but from all students. Students are the ones affected most by the declining quality of education.

Competition between K-State and KU is keen most of the time, and this is one time when it should be at its most intense. This competition will have more significance than another notch in the win/loss column though; it could determine the quality of a K-State education for a long time to come.

Ticket sales upsetting Students deserve fair system

Go State! As the football season comes to a close, basketball fans are licking their lips in anticipation of another, and final, rockin' season in Ahearn Field House. Many of these die-hard fans spent a couple of weeks camping out in front of Ahearn this month trying to get good season basketball tickets for the men's games. Unfortunately, what should have been two weeks of fun and excitement was turned into two weeks of confusion and anger. In case you missed what went on, let me fill you in on some of the details.

To start things off, there was a BIG controversy over whether or not a large living group that had been camping out since the beginning would be allowed to get enough tickets for the people who lived there. This group had been camping out for four days before it was told that it could only have six people in its tent instead of the 15 that it had been keeping there. This group was then split into three groups, one in fifth place and the other two in spots at the end of the line. The organizers of this group felt, and rightly so in my opinion, that the rule set up to limit the number of people per tent was discrimination aimed at large groups. It took a legal action to prevent this from coming through and to reach a compromise.

The thing that really was terrible about this was that it wasn't really the Basketball Ticket Sales Committee's fault. Granted, they could have organized and set some sort of policy sooner, but the fault wasn't really all theirs. They had planned on keeping campers away from attacking Ahearn until there was a policy set down. But, guess what. The athletic department wanted the campers there early and told the BBTSC to tell the campers to come back. The BBTSC had no real choice except to let campers back without a policy in effect. This incident points out the problem with basketball ticket sales being under the influence of two different masters. Do you want more controversy? Read on.

The die-hard 'Cat backers who had been camping out for up to two weeks got a nasty little surprise from the athletic department the week before the tickets were to go on sale.

Commentary

TROY MILLSAP
Guest Columnist

ICAT (I Contributed a Twenty), a group of people who have contributed money to the athletic department, would be allowed to buy their tickets ahead of everyone else, even though they only had to camp out for five days. Well now, that's fair, isn't it? I mean, everyone can afford to spend 20 more dollars for a basketball ticket, can't they? And if they can afford the $20, they shouldn't have to camp out for so long to get tickets, should they? This must have been the logic behind letting ICAT get tickets without putting forth the time and effort to support the 'Cats. I think people of ICAT should have to camp out longer for tickets. If they've got an extra $20 to give to the athletic department, they can surely afford to hire someone to take notes in class for them.

I'm sure some of you are wondering what my point is. My point is really quite simple. The University does not allow discrimination to be institutionalized in the areas of race, ethnic origin, creed or sex. The problems I've pointed out with basketball tickets show the institutionalized discrimination of people based upon their choice of living arrangements and financial status. I believe that the University needs to take a very close look at the situation and make some changes. I have some very commonsense solutions that the athletic department, Student Senate and the University community as a whole should pay attention to.

The first and most important thing to take care of is to decide who is in control of the basketball ticket sales policy. If the BBTSC is just an advisory board, then the athletic department should put out its final policy early enough for all groups, regardless of size, to know the rules and abide by them. If, on the other hand, the BBTSC is supposed to set the rules for ticket sales, then the athletic department should keep its hands off and quit making demands on them. It will be very difficult for any committee to function properly when the policy it makes can be simply ignored by the athletic department.

Secondly, I think the athletic department needs to review its policy of giving ICAT free preferred seating at games. The fact that ICAT membership shot up drastically, by around 300 percent after it was announced that members would get first shot at good seats for basketball tickets, shows that these aren't necessarily people who want to support scholarships for athletes. Many of those new members only wanted a guaranteed good seat for basketball season and were willing to pay for it. Some people are going to argue that ICAT privileges are just like the provisions we make for alumni who contribute money to the athletic department. That may be true, but the fact remains that we are not alumni. And if we have to kick in extra money for basketball tickets and whatever else comes up, just to be given an equal chance of getting the tickets or services, many of us won't be alumni because we will have run out of money.

We, the students of K-State, deserve a fair and equitable system of selling anything, education or basketball tickets. The responsibility for getting a fair deal, however, is up to us as students. We have to take it upon ourselves to make our feelings known to Student Senate, the athletic department or even President Jon Wefald. Make your telephone calls and letters be heard by these important people. We can guarantee a fair and equitable system here at K-State for all people — rich, poor, greek, "dormie" and GDI.

Don't sit there and wait for someone else to do it for you, because if you do, you may miss out on anything and everything.

ICAT beneficial

Editor,

I wanted to reply to Bill Nelson's letter in the Friday, Oct. 23, 1987, article speaking out against ICAT (Students That Back the 'Cats) and their preferential seating policy. First of all, ICAT is not just an organization to get good basketball seats. ICAT has done much more this year than the average student realizes. One event upcoming that the people in ICAT and the Student Foundation are sponsoring is the Wildcat Tipoff Classic 3-on-3 basketball tournament. This tournament has taken time and effort for the members of both the Student Foundation and ICAT.

Another event ICAT has sponsored is the bus trip to the Missouri football game. A real supporter of K-State athletics does not just support a winner. Everybody is expecting great things out of the basketball team, and with good reason, but ICAT got preferred seating at the football games and no fuss was raised over this matter. By showing our support at the Missouri game was one way for us to try and help the struggling football team win a game. Many people don't even go to the home games, but you can find a section of enthusiastic ICAT members at EVERY home game.

Still other events offered to ICAT members include chances to meet some of the K-State athletes and coaches.

I can see why many of the students that have been camping out for weeks are mad about ICAT members getting tickets early.

There are, however, many good seats left, and anybody who has camped out will be able to purchase the highly sought after tickets in sections C and D. Also, there are many other good seats available if one chooses to take initiative.

I can not deny that ICAT membership has gone up over the past couple of weeks so that basketball seats could be purchased. It is the hope of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics that these new members will contribute to the ICAT program in other ways as well, such as supporting the football team and the non-revenue sports.

Anyway, no one can argue that the money raised by ICAT, which goes to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund, will not help the sports program as a whole at K-State. With over 800 members at $20 a person, over $16,000 has been raised. That is a pretty good chunk of money, and is appreciated by the athletic department.

So despite bickering, and ICAT is not trying to create any controversy, there is much more of a benefit to being a member of ICAT than obtaining basketball tickets. The whole athletic program benefits. I say that we all come together, whether a member of ICAT or not, and support K-State athletics as a whole, not just the basketball team. I hope to see you at every basketball game, volleyball game and tennis match and other sporting events with the same enthusiasm.

Protest CIA visit

Editor,

We would like to applaud Mike Nichols' Oct. 20 column urging students to oppose the CIA's recruitment on campus at K-State. Because of criminal acts, such as those listed in Nichols' column, the CIA has been legally forbidden from recruiting students on some state university campuses in our country. We encourage all students to seriously consider the significance of allowing an organization with a known record of countless human rights violations (imagine the unknown violations!) to openly (and, therefore, legitimately?) recruit on our campus.

Students In Solidarity with Central America invites those sympathetic with the words of Mike Nichols to join us in protesting the CIA's presence on campus today, Oct. 29, from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in front of Holtz Hall.

In the words of Marc Kenan, activist involved in the CIA On Trial Project at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst: "Under international law and the Nuremberg principles, as developed after World War II, citizens not only have the right, but the RESPONSIBILITY, to take whatever measures necessary to halt violations of international law. It is our responsibility, as citizens of the international community, to stop our government from its crimes against humanity."

CIA recruitment

Editor,
I am writing in response to Michael Nichols' column Oct. 20 regarding on-campus recruitment by the CIA.

I'm not sure which of his ideas I disagree with most: that the CIA is a group of blood-thirsty soldiers who can do no right or that they shouldn't be allowed to recruit on campus.

Every country has some sort of intelligence gathering agency. It is generally accepted, at least in Western thought, that every political system deserves the right to defend itself. One form of defense is intelligence. I've read articles on several of the examples Nichols used in his editorial to demonstrate the atrocities committed by the CIA, and quite frankly, I wonder if we were reading about the same situations. Taken out of context, a lot of things we do could seem morally wrong. But as in all cases, an understanding of the background and history of the situation is necessary to form an educated opinion.

Also, if Nichols hadn't been so busy scrutinizing mistakes which were made over 25 years ago, he might have noticed that the man whom many consider to be the cause of the CIA's problems lately, is dead. Even most left-wing liberals believe that the new CIA director, William H. Webster, has the ability to make effective structural and procedural changes where necessary.

As far as banning them from campus goes, why stop with the CIA? We allow the recruitment on campus for companies who practice discriminatory hiring, produce harmful and dangerous products, pollute our environment, exploit our natural resources and support through investment the racist government of South Africa. Are we going to ban them, too? We even allow other "national organizations...that can claim being involved in numerous counts of murder, torture and a variety of similar atrocities." Of course, they are legitimized by being the Armed Forces.

We even promote these organizations through an institutionalized recruitment — K-State's ROTC program. No one would argue that the Armed Forces are necessary to defend and protect the United States. The CIA, whose purpose is the defense of U.S. interests, should then be given equal consideration.

Nichols is not in as big a majority as he thinks, and those of us who are interested should have the right to meet with the Agency's representatives. I would think Nichols ought to feel reassured that the CIA is drawing from a group of educated people who have been exposed to a wide variety of social and political opinions. Maybe a new outlook is what the CIA needs.

I have never been the least bit interested in military service nor am I a gun-toting redneck, but when the CIA comes to K-State, I'll be there.

Chivalry lives

Editor,

Thank you for printing in your Oct. 22 issue a most instructive missive from Professor W. Richter concerning ad feminam attacks on L.A. Wheeler (which Richter, puzzlingly, refers to as "ad hominem attacks").

Richter's manly defense of a beleaguered damsel is compelling evidence that despite persistent reports to the contrary, chivalry is not dead.

False answers

Editor,

Re: Oct. 26 article "Debate about Chiropractic."

When I was interviewed for the story, I didn't realize it was going to be a debate. I would like to offer a response to some of Dr. Smith's comments.

He states that "true nerve compression is relatively rare." This is not true because every time someone crosses their legs and their foot goes numb, nerve compression has occurred. Dr. Shu at Colorado University is doing medical research into spinal biomechanics. His research shows that pressure, as slight as the weight of a quarter on your palm, is enough to decrease the function of a nerve 60 percent. Surely the trauma of athletics, car wrecks and years of poor posture are enough to produce at least that amount of pressure on a nerve.

He also states that "chiropractic care gives an answer to everyone for every ailment."

I say that Chiropractic care is a better alternative than giving patients mind-numbing pain pills and drugs, then if it doesn't work, telling the patients to go home and live with a problem when "scientific medicine" can't relieve their suffering.

Lottery advertisements to begin soon

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Lottery officials unveiled the cornerstones Wednesday of a $449,000 advertising campaign designed to get state residents to play the first state-run gambling game in Kansas history.

The lottery agency showed off two television commercials and three radio commercials that will be used to promote the lottery before and after tickets go on sale for the first time Nov. 12. The advertisements will begin running statewide Thursday, Director Larry Montgomery said.

Montgomery also said kickoff celebrations are planned in 17 cities across the state, including Topeka, Wichita, Pittsburg, Liberal, Colby and Atchison, and sales will begin at about 2,800 retail stores.

"Lotteries fell into two categories," Montgomery said during a news conference at the lottery's Topeka headquarters, "those that had a pre-game commercial and those that wish they had."

The campaign for the first game,

"Up and Away," will actually feature two sets of ads. The game will feature $1 tickets with latex patches that buyers scratch off to see whether they have won a prize, which can range from a free ticket to $5,000.

In addition, the first game will end in January with a $100,000 jackpot drawing that contestants enter by sending the lottery agency five used, non-winning tickets. Montgomery said plans call for one contestant to be picked during each week of the game.

The first ads, which will run before Nov. 12, feature only the agency's "Scratch It Rich" jingle, an adaptation of the 1964 Isley Brothers rock 'n' roll classic, "Shout."

The television spots feature scenes of ordinary people playing the lottery in various settings. They will air on all network affiliate stations in Wichita, Hutchinson, Topeka, the Kansas City area and in the Pittsburg-Joplin, Mo., area, said Vaughn Sink, a partner in Sullivan, Higdon and Sink, the advertising and public relations firm the lottery hired.

Sink said the lottery agencies will also take out ads in newspapers and use billboards in areas that the television stations don't reach. Montgomery said the first part of the campaign will cost the state $132,000.

"It's to build excitement, to build awareness for the lottery," Montgomery said.

The second set of ads feature two elderly women. In the television spots, they are sitting on a front porch as one explains how to play the game. The second part of the campaign will cost the state $317,000, Montgomery said.

Lottery officials said the campaign is aimed at people between the ages of 25 and 55 and who make between $20,000 and $40,000 a year.

"We think the will wear well in a six-to-eight week campaign," Sink said of the characters in the advertisements.

However, the leader of a group planning an anti-lottery effort criticized the advertising campaign, calling it "a big lie."

The Rev. Richard Taylor, president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, said his group's campaign probably won't begin until after the first game starts. The group hopes to get retailers who don't sell tickets to display anti-lottery stickers and to convince people to shop at those stores.

Space Age — meets — the Prairie

Some airplanes, when one looks at them, defy any explanation as to how they stay airborne. Never mind the physics lessons taught about aerodynamics; those planes just don't look like they will stay in the air. The C-130 cargo plane sitting on the tarmac at the Manhattan Municipal Airport was no exception — too much airplane, not enough wing.

The plane and its crew are on standby, in case the weather clears up enough for the flight later in the afternoon. Clear weather is important when you have a date with a satellite. This is to be the crew's last journey over the prairie at the Konza Research Area.

Mother Nature's indifference to the Konza Prairie hasn't stopped the weather research conducted there, although it certainly hasn't encouraged it either. The latest research on the area was completed Oct. 16.

More than 75 scientists from four nations worked together trying to find a link between the biosphere — the area inhabited by plants and animals — and certain elements in the atmosphere that would affect the environment.

Once the link is established, more accurate weather forecasting may be possible.

"In order to better forecast the weather, we must have better methods of determining what's going on on the (earth's) surface. The question is, how do we put the surface into the model?" said Edward Kanemasu, professor of agronomy.

Data collection for research took place over four different phases: late spring, mid-summer, late summer and fall. The same experiments were conducted during each phase to determine how the seasonal biosphere changes influence weather.

A major part of the Konza has never been cultivated. Hundreds of varieties of plants may be found, many of which are original species. The Department of Biology, which manages the prairie, emphasizes conserving the Konza's natural environment.

Uniform vegetation and seasonal changes are two of the characteristics necessary for a site to be chosen by the NASA-sponsored Scientific Working Group. The prairie must also be located close to a major institute that provides logistical and technical support, Kanemasu said.

The Konza sports all three of these features. An added incentive to the science team to choose the prairie was its homogenous soil conditions and minimal variation in the terrain.

Terrain is a major consideration when data collection is done from in the air. More accurate data may be collected from a flat surface than from one with rolling hills and deep valleys. The Konza hills are neither numerous nor large enough to alter data collection.

In order to collect the information, two NASA planes and one helicopter were used in addition to three satellites.

Hurry up and wait. Anyone who has worked with the government or military becomes accustomed to this situation. Inside the plane, some of the men prepare for the flight they say will never take place. "The holes in the clouds will open up and then close again," they say. "We'll never take off."

Nevertheless, preparations are made. The men load computer tape that would last a normal computer more than 20 hours. A normal computer. But for this one, the paper will last only 45 minutes. Also, coffee is made, cookies are brought out, cigarettes are lit up. The videotaping system, which will be used to tape the entire flight, is pressed into service. On the screen pops up Jackie Gleason and Tom Hanks appearing in "Nothing in Common." Hurry up and wait.

The NASA pilots collected data for the experiments being conducted by using a method known as remote sensing, which is detecting and measuring data from a distance, said Ghassem Asrar, assistant professor of agronomy.

Satellites measure reflections given off by the earth's surface. These reflections are then measured in terms of vegetation, Kanemasu said. Since many different types of vegetation exist on the Konza, the satellite data will be matched to vegetation types to show reflection similarities and differences.

Jim Irons is one of the men waiting on the weather. He sold his idea to NASA of collecting images of the earth's surface with a camera that moves. Most images — especially those taken from satellites — are taken from only one angle, so reflections from the surface are collected only from that angle. On these flights, Irons has been testing his system where a camera moves and collects images from different angles.

The earth's surface is not flat like a mirror, so when light hits it, the reflections bounce in many different directions, he says. Then he goes back to the paperback novel he's been reading.

The aircraft was flown between 40 yards to 10 miles off the ground during the readings. Since the aircraft had to be used at a time when the satellite was passing over the prairie, coordinating the two was often difficult.

Inclement weather most often prevented the aircraft from flying. However, few other problems were encountered.

"The experiment has gone along very smoothly with no major problems, and we have had very good management," Kanemasu said.

The Konza experiment extended beyond the bounds of nationality with science teams from Canada, England and France participating.

To be considered for the Konza project, ideas had to be submitted by the interested parties. Applicants ranged from universities to private industry, both national and international. When chosen by the NASA-sponsored Scientific Working Group to participate in the project, a team of researchers was sent to Manhattan during each of the four phases.

"The foreign investigators proposed experiments, and if the idea is a good one they're allowed to come in and perform the experiments," Kanemasu said.

Analysis of the data will be conducted in two phases. Each of the individual groups will be doing some data analysis, including K-State. Final analysis of the data will take several years, Kanemasu said.

Passengers who are in the cargo hold of a C-130 aircraft taking off do not have a great view of the passing scenery. On this flight the on-board video camera provides the view. As the plane leaves the gray landing strip, the patchwork of fall explodes in full color on the monitors in the plane.

Moving over Tuttle Creek Reservoir so that instruments can be calibrated in flight, the plane climbs higher — heading for the target area south of Manhattan. The sky is clear and the sun is setting when the news comes over the intercom that the mission has been scrubbed. Clouds have obscured the target area from the satellite. And flight No. 13 of the last set of coordinated overflights ends too soon.

Senate studies task force Polling sites bill to be considered

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate will discuss the possibility of establishing an athletic ticket sales task force and hear from a K-State administrator who will be speaking about the freshman seminar classes at its regular meeting tonight.

"The athletic ticket sales task force will be presented to Senate as a solution to help the ongoing problem with ticket sales," said Doug Folk, junior in electrical engineering and student senator.

Folk said the task force would research the ticket sales situation and hopefully come up with a set policy for the sale of tickets.

Senate also plans to hear from Judy Lynch, assistant director of the Academic Assistance Center, about the progress of the freshman seminar program during the open period of its meeting.

"The freshman seminar program is a course for new students that provides an orientation to K-State, it also emphasizes other areas like study skills," Lynch said.

Lynch said she will be informing Senate about the progress of the program and answer any questions senators may have in regard to the specific functions of the program.

Senate will hear the first reading of three bills: the Alcohol and Drug Education and Prevention task force bill, the off-campus association special allocation bill and the athletic ticket sales task force proposal.

In old business, Senate will vote on Student Governing Association constitutional revisions and the bylaws revisions.

Senators will be voting tonight on a bill to increase the number of student election polling places. The proposed additional voting areas will either include Farrell Library or Derby Food Center.

Senate also will be voting on the Black Student Union special allocation of $1,495. The group is requesting the money to help pay for a keynote speaker for the Big Eight Conference on Black Student Government.

Candidates to meet for election forum

By The Collegian Staff

The three student body president candidates will participate in an Agricultural Elections Forum, tonight at 6:30 in Waters 137.

"The forum is a new idea which was created by the agriculture senators," said Scott Shuey, College of Agriculture senator and a junior in pre-veterinary medicine.

"The forum will give all the students in the college of agriculture a chance to listen to all the student body president candidates and all the College of Agriculture senator candidates in one setting," Shuey said.

Shuey explained that in the past all the candidates for the student government offices would speak at all the departmental club meetings. Because of the candidate's speeches, the meetings were long and many students would leave and not have a chance to hear the candidates speak.

The three student body president candidates — Jack Taylor, junior in arts and sciences; Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics; and Troy Lubbers, junior in business administration — will be the first to speak during the forum.

The 10 College of Agriculture student senator candidates will speak following the student body president candidates.

AIDS patients are 39 percent minorities

By The Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Secretary of Health and Human Services Otis R. Bowen called Wednesday for a campaign to convince blacks and Hispanics, groups which suffer disproportionately from AIDS, that sexual promiscuity and drug abuse are life-and-death matters.

"Abstinence, monogamy and avoidance of drugs are no longer just good morals," Bowen told students and staff at the predominantly black Meharry Medical College. "Now they are good medical science."

More than 10,000 blacks have contracted acquired immune deficiency syndrome since 1981 in the United States. That translates into 25 percent of all AIDS cases in the country, though blacks make up 12 percent of the population.

Hispanics account for 14 percent of AIDS patients, but only 6 percent of the population.

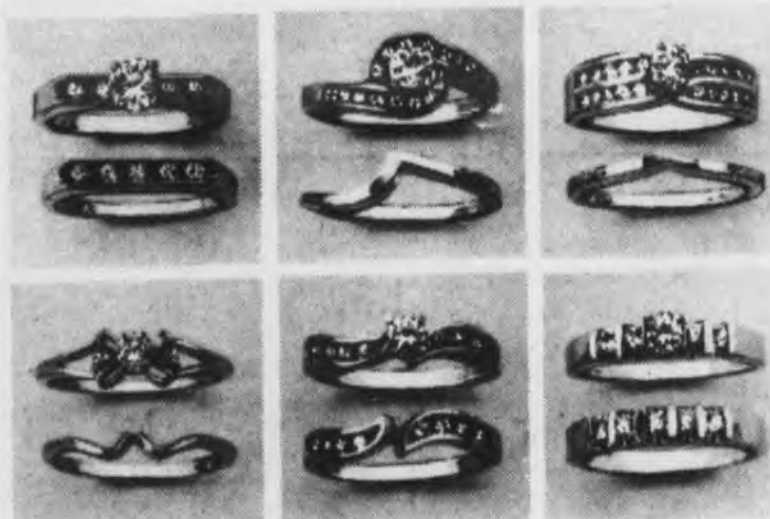

Bowen said the use of contaminated needles by intravenous drug users is the major means of spreading the disease in both groups.

The federal government has targeted a "considerable portion" of its AIDS public education program for minorities, Bowen said.

On the Chicago Board of Trade's futures market, a bushel of soybeans for November delivery cost about $5.39 Tuesday. That's about 5 cents less than the settlement price Oct. 16, but the decline hasn't been nearly as severe as the drop in stock prices.

The gap between cash and futures prices traditionally widens during the fall harvest, Franci said.

Meat producers — especially beef farmers — may have a tougher time if a recession cuts the demand for meat, he said.

Comedy hits McCain

Commandos perform tonight

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reporter

The Coors Light Comedy Commandos, featuring Taylor Mason and David Naster, will invade McCain Auditorium tonight at 8.

The event is sponsored by the Union Program Council Eclectic Committee.

During their 46-city Coors Light Tour, the comedy team will perform for more than 900 audiences. They will be visiting numerous college campuses and comedy clubs throughout the country. Acts range from mime and one-liners to improvisation and songs.

"Coors Light and the art of comedy have both grown phenomenally over the past years, and we believe this will prove to be an excellent partnership in 1987," said June Smith, Coors Light brand director.

Both comedians have appeared on national television. Mason, originally from Chicago, is soon to be featured on the USA Network's cable television show, "Night Flight." Naster, from Kansas City, was recently featured on NBC's "Comedy Club." He is also regularly featured in Manhattan at comedy invasion at Bushwacker's.

"We believe the group assembled to represent Coors Light on this tour will provide a variety of tasteful and funny material to our young adult audiences," Smith said.

The Commandos were the brainchild of comedian Tim Settimi, who presented the concept to Coors. The team began touring in March of 1987. All of the comedians are represented by Edmonds Talbert Inc., a management firm with offices in New York and Chicago.

"Edmonds Talbert was chosen because of its prestige. It was chosen as Managing Agency of the Year," said Maureen FitzPatrick, representative of the Coors Light Comedy Commandos.

"So far attendance has been great. They have been averaging about 700 to 1,000 people at every show."

Other Commando members, which will not be appearing at K-State, are: John Ferrentino, Sue Kolinsky, Settimi and Mary Wong (a comedy team of three men — Ali, Tim Miller and Kevin Norman).

Tickets for the performance are $2 and can be purchased at the Student Activities Center in the Union or at the McCain Auditorium Box Office. Tickets are general admission and the event is open to the public.

Play interpreted as 'nonsense'

By The Collegian Staff

"The Gas Heart," a play by Tristan Zara, will be presented at 8 tonight and Friday night in Purple Masque Theatre. Directed by Jennifer Dohl, graduate student in speech, the play is an example of experimental theater.

"The audience's perception of the play is totally what it brings to it. The play is nonsense, there is no plot. The spectators must use their own perceptions to get anything out of the play," Dohl said.

"The Gas Heart" was written in response to the mechanic nature of the world, she said.

"The use of language is odd and disconnected. It is renouncing written work. It's saying words don't mean anything," Dohl said.

The play, written in 1918, was created by Zara as a revolt against World War I, and is part of Dadaism, an artistic and literary movement protesting the status quo in art. The play is being performed as a project by Dohl and Jennifer Hays, junior in theater.

"Dadaism eventually died out because people tried to explain it in words, when the point of Dadaism was not to use words in the regular way," she said.

Dohl said much of today's art came from Dadaism, which lasted from 1916 to 1923. A display of such artwork will be in the lobby of the Purple Masque before each performance.

"People who are interested in a new experience should come and see the play," Dohl said.

Stephan to take policies tour

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan leaves Kansas Friday for a fact-finding tour of the Central American countries of El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua.

Stephan is one of five state attorneys general who will be visiting the Latin American countries on the tour sponsored by the Commission on United States-Latin American Relations in Washington, D.C., which is paying for all the expenses. He will return to the United States Nov. 9. Attorneys general from Kentucky, Texas, New Mexico and Colorado will also go on the tour.

"The impact of U.S. policy in the region will be the underlying theme of the trip," Melinda DeLashmutt, director of the commission, said in a release. "We feel it is essential that high-level officials in the United States get a first-hand view of the impact of our policy in the region."

The attorneys general will be visiting the region as the provisions of the Arias Peace Plan, signed in September by five Central American presidents, begin to take effect.

"Besides examining the status of the Central American peace accord, the delegation will look at the administration of justice," DeLashmutt said.

The delegation will meet with high-level government and military officials, U.S. Embassy representatives, along with spokesman for human rights groups, labor and the Catholic Church.

Crops harvested early due to dry weather

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Because of the dry weather, the fall harvest for all crops in Kansas is well ahead of normal, the Kansas Agricultural Statistics says in a recent report.

The dry weather has allowed farmers to enter their fields an average of six days during the week.

"Surface moisture supplies remains a concern in many areas, especially where wheat needs to emerge and establish good growth before winter dormancy sets in," the report said.

The corn harvest is 95 percent completed in the state. Last year it was 75 percent completed at this time.

Northwest and north-central Kansas have the largest percentage of corn yet to be harvested, the report said. The condition of the corn is rated at 84 percent good to excellent and 16 percent fair to poor.

"Practically all the sorghum crop is mature, and at 95 percent is equal to last year at this time and ahead of the 90 percent average," the report said.

The sorghum harvest is 65 percent complete for the state, which is well ahead of last year's 45 percent and the 40 percent average. The harvest has progressed fastest in the eastern third of the state.

Condition of the sorghum crop is rated at 87 percent good to excellent and 13 percent fair to poor.

"Virtually all the soybean crop has dropped leaves, compared to 95 percent for both last year and the average," the report said. The harvest has reached the 75 percent mark, well ahead of last year's 40 percent and the average of 50 percent for this time of year.

Condition of the soybean crop is rated at 70 percent good to excellent, 24 percent good and 6 percent fair.

Wheat seeding is 99 percent completed at the state level, the report said, and 90 percent of the crop has emerged. At this time last year 80 percent of the crop had emerged and the average over a five-year period is 70 percent.

Lady Cats loaded with youthful talent

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

Laden with underclassmen, the K-State women's basketball team has been practicing for a little more than two weeks in preparation for its season opener in late November.

No returning starters, no seniors and only one junior, a junior college transfer, mark the Lady Cats' roster this season. But to Coach Matilda Mossman — in her fourth year at K-State — and her staff's advantage, this squad was recruited by them 100 percent.

"There's no feelings that 'I was recruited by someone else.' I think that makes a big difference," Mossman said. "You always have more loyalty and an allegiance to the people who recruited you."

Here is a player-by-player look, along with Mossman's evaluations, at the 1987-88 Lady Cats:

Stacey Boyle, 6-foot-1 junior center. Transfer from Dodge City Community College. A Kodak All-American who averaged 27 points and 11 rebounds per game last season. "Stacey's someone that we can put in the middle, has experience...and (we) can build our offense around."

Elyse Funk, 5-foot-5 sophomore guard. Projected starting point guard who played in 30 of 31 games in a reserve role last season. "I feel real confident with Elyse running our team. She knows what we want. She usually doesn't make the same mistake twice."

Amy Davidson, 5-foot-9 sophomore guard-forward. Top reserve scorer last season with an average of 3.9 points per game. "Amy has emerged from the preseason workouts as one of our more competitive players. She's caught our eye more in practices than anybody (else)."

Janet Madsen, 5-foot-9 sophomore guard-forward. Was tabbed "suber sub" at the Big Eight Conference tournament last season with 24 points and nine rebounds in three games. "Janet's going to get most of her points off rebounds and free throws."

Rita Matteucci, 5-foot-11 sophomore forward. Saw limited action in 1986-87 with a wrist injury. Averaged 2.4 points per game last season. "Rita's now playing with more confidence; doing more of the things we saw when we recruited her as a high school senior."

Carol Smith, 5-foot-7 sophomore guard. Posted a 2.2 points per game average last season. Smith is the Lady Cats' solution to the three-point line. "Carol gives us a threat at the three-point line. She can stand at the top of the key and hit 70 percent of her shots from out there."

Stephanie Lane, 6-foot-4 sophomore center. Third-year sophomore who led the reserves in rebounds last season with 2.4 boards per game. Second-best on the team last year in blocked shots with 11. "I think people are going to be impressed with how much Stephanie has improved."

Kristie Bahner, 5-foot-11 freshman forward. All-State performer for Topeka High School. "Definitely the most overlooked player in the state. I think two or three years down the road, people are going look back and wonder why they didn't recruit Kristie."

Jennifer Grebing, 6-foot-2 freshman center. Helped Perryville (Mo.) High School to the state playoffs all four years while she was there. Scored more than 1,600 points in her high school career. "Very aggressive. I think Jennifer's going to help us a lot in the post position."

Nadira Hazim, 5-foot-8 freshman guard. USA Today honorable mention high school All-American while at Topeka West. Scored 42 points in the Class 6A state tournament, breaking Lynette Woodward's record. "Just a tremendous athlete. Nadira's going to get a lot of playing time just because of her speed."

Diana Miller, 5-foot-11 freshman forward. All-State performer from Buhler High School (Hutchinson) by two newspapers. Converse high school All-American. "Legitimately one of the top freshman players in the country."

After banner NCAA season, women's team starts over

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

Most coaches would have quit and started selling real estate, insurance or used cars.

After a 22-9 season and an appearance in the NCAA tournament, K-State women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman couldn't have been blamed last season if she asked for a permanent residence on "cloud nine."

Enter reality. Four starters graduated and the fifth starter, 5-foot-8 junior forward Tracey Blecinski, left the squad earlier this year to pursue her degree. This left Mossman with no seniors, one junior college transfer and a bevy of underclassmen on the roster.

Mossman, though, isn't worried about this season's edition of the Lady Cats. She has a fond memory: "This team reminds me a lot of my first year at Arkansas when we had five freshman, three of them starters, and we went 26-10 and made the 'Sweet 16' at the national tournament," Mossman said.

That's not to say the senior-dominated starting lineup used in 27 of 31 games last season won't be missed.

"We're going to miss the seniors because they did so many instinctive things freshmen won't do because they haven't been to battle that many times. We're going to miss not having to explain every little thing," Mossman said.

In her fourth season at K-State, Mossman had an excellent recruiting season nabbing four all-state performers — Diana Miller, Nadira Hazim, Kristie Bahner and Jennifer Grebing — who have people talking about the Lady Cats' future potential.

But Mossman prefers to talk about the present.

"I look at all these freshmen and I know we have a very talented group. The thing we're going to have to keep reminding ourselves of is...we are going to have to be patient with them," Mossman said.

"Everybody that looks at this team says, 'They'll be great two or three years down the road.' Well, we're excited about right now. We have to get through this year before we get to that stage," she added.

Only two players appear to have locked up starting spots. Stacey Boyle, a 6-foot-1 junior by way of Dodge City Community College will be the center. Elyse Funk, a 5-foot-5 sophomore, is the projected starting guard.

Boyle, Mossman said, will fit right in with K-State's motion offense. Funk started one game at Oklahoma last season when Susan Green missed because of disciplinary reasons. Funk had a career high six assists in the game.

With the addition of the three-point line in women's hoops, Carol Smith will see plenty of action because Mossman said she can hit from 19-9 "70 percent of the time." Janet Madsen has the burden of filling Blecinski's role.

Other returning letterwinners include 5-foot-9 sophomore guard-forward Amy Davidson, 6-foot-4 sophomore center Stephanie Lane and 5-foot-11 sophomore forward

Rita Matteucci.

Defensively, Mossman said the team has enough overall quickness to maintain the full-court press.

"Several of the new kids played man-to-man in high school, therefore it will be easier to teach them our defensive system," she said.

Mossman's freshmen had better learn quickly. K-State must contend with a schedule that includes meeting nationally ranked Louisiana State and Louisiana Tech at Ahearn Field House, and a chance to meet another perennial women's basketball power, Stephen F. Austin, at a tournament.

"We may have overdid it," said Mossman about the schedule. "But I'm excited about the fact we have two nationally ranked teams coming in here and the chance to play another on the road. Obviously, that gives us some national exposure."

As for the Big Eight Conference, Kansas, Oklahoma State, Colorado and Nebraska appear to be the cream of the crop. Iowa State, Oklahoma and Missouri, along with K-State, will be rebuilding.

"We're probably going to be picked last (in the Big Eight) and who wouldn't you pick last?" Mossman said.

Stranger things have happened. Take last year for example: the Lady Cats were expected to have a winning season, that's about it. K-State went 9-5 and tied for first place in the conference with Missouri and Kansas. And Mossman was selected as the Big Eight's Coach of the Year.

"The teams are pretty much separated on paper, but in this league you never know what's going to happen once the season starts," Mossman said.

Collegian/Neal Hinkle

Stephanie Lane, left, and Diana Miller try to gain control of the ball during a defensive drill at Ahearn Field House Wednesday afternoon. The Lady Cats will be without five of last year's starters this season.

Another advantage the Lady Cats have is playing in Ahearn.

"We were 13-0 in Ahearn and a lot of it was because we play a lot of our games before the men do. Maybe initially the crowds didn't come to see us play, but I think the crowds started getting here earlier because of what we were doing," Mossman said.

Wildcats picked 4th in conference

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Forward Danny Manning of Kansas is the pre-season pick as Big Eight basketball player of the year for the third year in a row, but sportswriters and broadcasters participating in the conference's ninth annual poll strongly favor Missouri to repeat as the champion.

In five of the previous eight years, the scribes have correctly predicted the champion. This time, the record 55 participants gave Missouri 36 first-place votes for a total of 415 points out of a possible 440.

Kansas was next with 17 first-place votes and 396 points, while two voters picked Oklahoma, giving the Sooners 331 points.

K-State got 276 points, Iowa State 197, Oklahoma State 172, Nebraska 128 and Colorado 65.

In the balloting for player of the year, Manning had 47 votes, to four for Missouri's Derrick Chievous and one for Iowa State's Jeff Grayer.

Oklahoma's Mookie Blaylock was the pre-season choice for newcomer of the year, getting eight votes, to seven for Marvin Branch of Kansas. Players from all eight schools got votes in this category.

The top five vote-getters in the balloting for the all-conference team were Manning — a unanimous choice — Chievous, Grayer, Harvey Grant of Oklahoma and Mitch Richmond of K-State.

Hearns goes for fourth boxing title

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Thomas Hearns will try to become the first boxer to win titles in four weight classes when he fights Juan Domingo Roldan Thursday night.

At stake will be the World Boxing Council middleweight championship, which became vacant when Sugar Ray Leonard retired after upsetting Marvelous Marvin Hagler last April 6.

On hand for Hearns' bid to make history will be Sugar Ray Leonard, who stopped Hearns in the 14th round of a battle for the undisputed welterweight championship in 1981, and Marvelous Marvin Hagler, who knocked out Hearns in the third round of an undisputed middleweight title defense in 1985.

Leonard will attend as a spectator, while Hagler will be a commentator on the closed-circuit and pay-per-view telecast of the scheduled 12-round bout at a 10,100-seat outdoor stadium at the Las Vegas Hilton.

"I'm evaluating the situation," said Hagler, who is a possible opponent for the winner. "I want to sit back, watch these guys and see what happens."

"This fight will put me above everyone else out there," the 29-year-old Hearns said. "This fight definitely will make up for those two losses."

Hearns, an 8-5 favorite, is one of 10 men to win at least pieces of three titles. Six of those 10 won their third titles in the 1980s when the number of weight classes doubled from the traditional eight and most championships have been split.

Only of two those six champions held an undisputed title — Roberto Duran, lightweight, and Leonard, welterweight.

However, Hearns' road has not been an easy one. If he succeeds, his four titles would span weight classes ranging from 147 pounds to 175 pounds.

Hearns, the former World Boxing Association welterweight (147) and WBC super welterweight (154) champion, relinquished the WBC light heavyweight (175) title to fight for the 160-pound title.

He is the fourth man to attempt to win a fourth title. The three who failed were Henry Armstrong, who fought a 10-round draw with Ceferino Garcia in a bid for the middleweight title in 1940; Alexis Arguello, who was knocked out by Aaron Pryor in bids for the junior welterweight title in 1982 and 1983, and Duran, who lost a decision to Hagler in 1983.

Hearns attempt is scheduled to begin at 6 p.m., following Bobby Czyz's scheduled 15-round defense of the International Boxing Federation light heavyweight title against Charles Williams. That fight will begin about 5 p.m. and also will be televised.

Hagler, who stopped Roldan in the 10th round of a title defense in 1984, thinks "the fight should be very even. Roldan is very awkward and very quick."

The 30-year-old Roldan said through an interpreter, "I know it's a difficult task, but on Oct. 29 whatever is in front of me will lose by a knockout. We need a title in Argentina, and that's why I'm working so hard."

Roldan would be the third Argentine to be middleweight champion since 1970. Carlos Monzon was undisputed champion from 1970 until he retired in 1977 after 14 defenses, and Hugo Corro was the undisputed champion in 1978-79.

Mattingly receives '1' rating

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Don Mattingly, widely regarded as the best player in baseball, is the first to receive a perfect score in statistical rankings used to determine compensation for free-agent signings.

The New York Yankees first baseman received a perfect 1,000 in the Elias Sports Bureau rankings, which were established seven years ago as part of the settlement of the players' strike.

The rankings are based on performance in at least five categories over a two-year period. After being ranked by position, players are divided into five groups: outfielders, first basemen and designated hitters; second basemen, third basemen and shortstops; catchers; starting pitchers; and relievers.

'Big bucks' lure professionals to Australian tourney

By The Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO, Texas — The money — all $3 million of it — is wonderful, said Greg Norman.

But should it count? The Australian raised the question Wednesday on the eve of the Nabisco Championships of Golf, the richest tournament golf has ever seen.

Norman is among the elite 30 golfers who are competing for $2 million, with $360,000 to the winner, in the Championships of Golf.

In addition, the tournament that begins Thursday on the Oak Hills

Country Club course serves as the culmination of the Nabisco Grand Prix of Golf, a season-long point list based on players' performances in regular-season events.

Another $1 million, with $175,000 to the winner, will be distributed in the Grand Prix competition.

And that money will be "official," meaning that it will count toward the season's money-winning lead. It is the first time so-called bonus money — anything other than actual tournament prize money — has been counted as official.

"This offsets what happens on the golf course," said Norman, the "Great White Shark" who led the American and Australian tours in money-winnings last season.

"It penalizes the guy like me — and there are only a few of us — who travel a lot and don't play the 25 to 28 tournaments a year in this country that you have to play to be competitive in the Grand Prix."

"If they had this last year, I wouldn't have won the money title," Norman said.

"I think they have to introduce something to be more fair to everyone," he said. Then he offered a disclaimer.

"Of course, it's my decision to play abroad instead of playing here all the time," he said.

Ben Crenshaw had a different view.

"This tournament was meant to be a bonus, a reward for the fellows who have played the best all year."

"It was meant to be an important, season-ending tournament. It's certainly that," Crenshaw said.

Norman quickly agreed that "the bottom line is that it's great for all of us to be playing for this kind of money."

In addition to the enormous prize money to be distributed, such important titles as Player of the Year and leading money-winner will be decided this week, along with the finals of the team charity competition, in which another $1.4 million in charitable contributions will be determined.

Curtis Strange is a central figure in most of the races that end this week.

He leads Paul Azinger in both the Player of the Year and money-winning races, and is in front in the Grand Prix standings, with Crenshaw second and Azinger third.

Rebel gunfire kills four

By The Associated Press

ANGELES CITY, Philippines — Suspected communist rebels shot and killed two U.S. airmen and two other people Wednesday in separate daylight attacks near the giant U.S. Clark Air Base.

U.S. officials said the dead included two Air Force sergeants, a Filipino retired from the U.S. Air Force and a Filipino businessman of U.S. ancestry. Assassins also fired on an Air Force captain.

The attacks came within 15 minutes of each other and followed by several hours the slayings of two policemen and the wounding of an army colonel in Manila. Authorities also blamed those on the rebels.

Names of the victims were not immediately available. Base spokesman Maj. Thomas Boyd said both airmen were in uniform.

Maj. Gen. Donald Snyder, commander of the 13th Air Force, said the motive for the killings were unknown. But Col. Manuel Caranza, security officer of the Philippine military's Clark Air Base Command, said he suspected communist rebels were responsible.

He said the style of the attacks and the weapons used — .45-caliber pistols — pointed to rebel assassination teams known as "sparrow units" for the swiftness of their assaults.

Francisco Nepomuceno, mayor of Angeles City, also said he suspected communist assassination squads because of recent U.S. arms shipments and statements of support for President Corazon Aquino's government.

A statement by the Philippine military said the first attack came at about 3:45 p.m. when three assailants shot dead an Air Force sergeant in front of a McDonald's less than two miles from the base.

Moments later, up to 15 gunmen ambushed the car of another Air Force sergeant, killing him instantly. The Filipino businessman, who stopped to investigate, was also slain.

The retired Air Force sergeant was shot dead as he drove his station wagon near a military housing area, the statement said.

The Air Force captain was attacked near another housing area at about the same time, the statement added. When the captain returned fire, the rebels fled.

acter flaw."

Haig said that loyalty is not always telling the boss what he wants to hear. "Loyalty is telling the man you work for what your conscience tells you," he said.

Added du Pont, "My friend George Bush says we ought to be for that INF treaty even before it's written. Read before you sign, George."

Haig, a former five star general, carried the battle to Bush often.

He said the prospective arms control agreement makes conventional war more possible in Europe. He said he had talked with several European heads of state, and they were "unnerved" about the treaty, but were subjected to "arm-twisting" by the Reagan administration.

But Bush, who visited Europe a month ago, rattled off the names of several heads of state he met, and insisted they all approved the deal.

Plenty of heat was generated by the tax issue, as well.

Dole staked out a position as a leader able to work with Congress in enacting a deficit reduction plan, and said he was eager to work with Democrats and the White House to seek a compromise.

He made no definitive statement on whether he would approve a tax increase.

Stores

Ron Harold, manager of Bailey Moving and Storage, was not as satisfied with his settlement.

The first offer, Harold said, was half of what he believed the property was worth. Thus, he appealed and hired a lawyer.

The court-appointed appraisal was double the original offer. But, after the city won its appeal on the second offer, the settlement was lowered by one-fourth.

Bailey's received fair compensation for relocation, but the move still adversely affected business, he said. Since the new location is away from a major highway or street, there's not much walk-in business, Harold said.

"(The city) only has to offer a fair market value for your property, regardless of where it is. The location doesn't seem to matter. You could be in the stockyards or you could be on main street — you have x number of square feet so you're worth x number of dollars," Harold said.

For Big A Auto Parts, the cost of doing business downtown is approximately 40 percent of what it costs to do business at its new location, Bosch said.

Not all businesses were dissatisfied with their compensations. Dick Edward's Ford officials said they were fairly compensated and have no ill-feelings about their move.

Nina Miley, current owner of Swanson's Bakery, better known as Swannie's, has been thankful for the city's monetary support.

The original owner of the bakery, Richard Swanson, had agreed to go out of business and received acquisition compensation from the city. Then he sold the bakery and moved.

Plane lands in street due to engine trouble

By The Associated Press

BARTLESVILLE, Okla. — A cargo plane with engine trouble skidded across a usually busy street during the rush hour Wednesday morning and stopped 150 yards short of a house following a wheels-up emergency landing.

The pilot and co-pilot of the twin-engine turboprop escaped with minor injuries in the 7:30 a.m. accident and no one on the ground was hurt, said Bartlesville Police Capt. John Evans. The names of the pilot and co-pilot were not released.

"Normally, that road's loaded with people. It's just a miracle that no one was killed," said Jim Edwards, assistant manager of the Bartlesville Municipal Airport.

The Convair 660 owned by SMB Stage Lines of Dallas came to rest in a ditch beside Sunset Boulevard, the main arterial connecting the Oak Park Village neighborhood to downtown.

"It's a pretty good size airplane," said Larry Bradshaw, who mans the Phillips Petroleum Co. tower at the airport and advises aircraft about takeoffs and landings.

The left wing was ripped off when the plane clipped a tree and an engine remained in the street late Wednesday as Federal Aviation Administration officials arrived on the scene.

There was no fire, but firefighters were summoned because an estimated 200 gallons of aviation fuel leaked from the plane, officials said.

Fire Chief Paul Dick said there were reports that a motorist saw the plane skidding down the sod runway toward the street and halted, preventing other traffic from moving into the airplane's path. Evans could not confirm that report.

Walter Trammel, owner of the property where the aircraft stopped, said he was standing in his driveway and saw the plane approach, touch down and skid to a halt. He said the pilot and co-pilot were able to get out of the airplane without difficulty.

Library lacks funds

Optimism low for increase

By Chuck Horner
Collegian Reporter

K-State has a smaller number of volumes in its library than any nationwide peer university or any other Big Eight school, said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

"It is tough for me to be optimistic with the current financial situation," Hobrock said. "I can only hope K-State and the state of Kansas continue the progress started in this decade."

Prolonged budgetary constraints, devaluation of the dollar overseas and inflation have all combined to adversely impact Farrell Library's long-term ability to expand its collections, Hobrock said.

"In the library business, you have to buy now or you can't get it later," he said.

Prior to 1984, budget shortfalls caused inadequate support for buying publications, he said.

Publishers of research and scientific publications often reduce the number of copies printed in order to avoid paying taxes on inventories. If books are not purchased when they are initially offered for sale, they may not be available later or may cost four times their original purchase price, Hobrock said.

However, K-State has an ongoing expansion program that ranks high among peer universities, according to Mid-America State University Association statistics for fiscal year 1986.

"The greatest danger the library faces is having the progress (that was) started in the mid-80s wiped out in one fell swoop by budget reductions," Hobrock said.

Hobrock considers the collections in Farrell to be priceless and irreplaceable.

"Any dollar amount applied to the value of the collection would be purely speculative. Fifty million would be a conservative estimate," Hobrock said.

Subscriptions to periodicals continue to consume a major portion of the library budget. Hobrock said the library spends $1.45 million annually on periodicals.

While devaluation of the dollar overseas has averaged 25 percent, prices for foreign published periodicals have increased an average of 46 percent because of price gouging, he said.

The average annual cost of a subscription to a United States published periodical is $125, while annual subscriptions to foreign periodicals average $234, he said.

"There are periodicals in Farrell that cost in excess of $3,500 annually, and when someone rips one of these off, they are not only stealing state property, they are also committing a felony," Hobrock said.

The theft, damage or destruction of books and periodicals is a major detractor from the library's ability to expand, said Sara Williams, preservation librarian.

Cost of repair for a book averages $20 to $25, and an average of 150 books a year require major repairs, Williams said.

Williams said while the 150 figure may not seem overwhelming, there are other impacts to be considered. Funds must be set aside for repairs and cannot be used to purchase other books, books being repaired are unavailable to users, and books beyond repair may not be replaceable.

Only books processed through Farrell's circulation department are ever identified as needing repair. There may be many books in the library that require repair but have not been identified, she said.

Hobrock said in the future Farrell should experience a modest growth of video systems, a need for shelf space for an additional 200,000 volumes, and an automated catalog system that can be accessed from remote terminals dispersed throughout the campus. He said Fort Hays State University, The Wichita State University and the University of Kansas already have similar systems.

Kevin Hutcheson, junior in computer science, receives a glaucoma exam from Clarrie Robben, an optometry nurse at the health fair Wednesday afternoon. About 560 people visited the Health Fair.

Fitness checked at health fair

By The Collegian Staff

About 560 people received health information or stopped by for a check-up at the Health Fair '87 Wednesday in the Union Ballroom.

The purpose of the health fair was to increase awareness of personal health and the effects certain lifestyles can have on the quality of life, said Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene Student Health Center.

Health education exhibits were displayed featuring information on nutrition, alcohol and other drugs, cancer, AIDS, and eating disorders.

Health screening including blood pressure testing, vision and hearing checks, glaucoma testing, dental assessments, and physical fitness assessments was a major part of the fair.

"The day has been fun," said Brent Benkelman, oral surgeon from Manhattan. "The affair is an exciting day for health in Manhattan."

"I think it's a great opportunity to check up on a few things without any expense or inconvenience to students," said Kent Bradley, senior in nutrition science and student body president. "It works on a walk-in basis which makes it nice."

Many students attended the health fair because of general curiosity.

"I saw it in the paper and was curious," said Angie McAtee, junior in business administration. "I never had a physical, so I figured this is the best way to do it."

Andrea Canelos, junior in mechanical engineering, said, "I have never been before. It's good to get an overall picture of how I'm doing."

Garalyn Avery, medical technologist at Lafene, said the blood chemistry testing center was "busy, busy." She said about 225 people had their blood tested.

sure on stocks Wednesday.

The dollar fell to 1.74 West German marks from 1.76 late Tuesday in New York and to 138 Japanese yen from 141 late Tuesday. The British pound strengthened to $1.72 from $1.71 late Tuesday.

The dollar's drop spooked stock traders in the early going as bond prices sagged and worries emerged that a lower dollar would reverse the trend toward lower interest rates that had so far helped to ease the stock market crisis.

But some economists said the dollar's fall also could give a boost to stocks. A cheaper dollar makes U.S.

goods more competitive in world markets, helping U.S. industry, said Barton Biggs, managing director for international investment strategy at Morgan Stanley & Co.

Because the dollar's decline had been expected, it was taken in stride, Biggs said.

Nevertheless, bond prices slumped in reaction to the dollar's drop.

Watergate wife turns broker

LOS ANGELES — Maureen Dean has gone from the Watergate hearings to a career as a California stockbroker, and she says she is riding the rollercoaster developments on Wall Street with aplomb.

"Mo" Dean said nothing that happens in the stock market could be harder than the role she played 14 years ago, when her husband John was a key witness during the Watergate hearings.

"I was able to live through Watergate and all the things that happened to me personally afterwards, so I will through this," she said. "It's not the end of the world."

Dean, 42, has also branched into a new career with a novel called "Washington Wives," which portrays sex and intrigue in the nation's capital. She says she would not want to move back to Washington.

Dean became well-known during the summer of 1973 as the beautiful young wife who stood by her husband as his testimony helped drive President Richard M. Nixon from office.

After the hearings the couple moved to Los Angeles, where her husband now specializes in selling small- and medium-sized businesses.

Author writes of 'dirty' west

EDINBURG, Texas — Author Larry McMurtry says he is fascinated by the "sleazy, little miserable, dirty circuit" that 19th-century gunfighters traveled.

McMurtry, 52, who won the Pulitzer Prize for fiction for his 1985 novel "Lonesome Dove," said his work in progress is "about a gun fighter, a very young gunfighter coming along sort of at the end of the era of gun fighting."

The "vanishing breed, the end of an era" are common themes in his writing, McMurtry said Wednesday at Pan American University in Edinburg.

"I'm attracted to the sleazy, little miserable, dirty circuit that the gunfighters traveled, you know, from the raw cowtowns in Kansas in the sixties and seventies west into Texas and some of the mining towns of Colorado and New Mexico," McMurtry said. "And finally, the few of them that were left in Tombstone, Ariz., and a few even got on to Hollywood, one or two."

Award winner found 'sockless'

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Singer Holly Dunn had to borrow a pair of socks before she could accept an award this month at the Country Music Association award show.

Terry O'Neill, a spokesman for Dunn, said she forgot her socks and had to borrow a pair to wear under her boots. Singer K.T. Oslin provided a pair in their dressing room at the Grand Ole Opry House.

Dunn, best known for her hit "Daddy's Hands," won the Horizon Award for promising performers on Oct. 12.

Boy found guilty of fire death

NEWARK, N.J. — An 11-year-old boy admitted setting on fire a man who was sleeping on a housing project stairway and faces up to 20 years in prison in the man's death, officials say.

The boy, who was accompanied to court by his parents, pleaded guilty to murder Wednesday during a juvenile court proceeding. His name was withheld because of his age.

Protesters block U.S. convoy

STUTTGART, West Germany — Anti-nuclear protesters briefly blocked a U.S. Army convoy on Pershing 2 missile maneuvers Thursday, police said.

Police said there were no injuries and that six demonstrators were arrested and later released.

The Pershing 2 maneuvers began earlier this week and are being carried out in several southern West German states.

Protesters blocked the convoy for about 45 minutes while it was traveling down a country road near the town of Gernersheim, about 60 miles southwest of Heidelberg.

West German police officers were called and cleared the protesters from the road. Police did not say how many protesters took part in the incident.

The maneuvers are scheduled to continue until Nov. 8.

Furnaces blamed for deaths

WASHINGTON — Lack of proper maintenance of Blue-ray "Blue Flame" furnaces or boilers could lead to carbon monoxide poisoning, the Consumer Product Safety Commission said Thursday.

Blue-ray Systems Inc., of Schuylkill Haven, Pa., has issued an alert to oil heat technicians, oil heat distributors and homeowners of the importance of careful maintenance of the units, the commission reported.

According to the agency, seven deaths from carbon monoxide poisoning have been linked to improper maintenance of these units.

Some 21,000 furnaces and 14,500 boilers were sold by the firm from 1974 to 1983, the agency reported.

Consumers were being reminded that annual maintenance of the units is necessary, and the company is attempting to send reminders to all people living in homes where the units have been installed.

The units can be identified by a blue and white label reading "Blue-ray by Blue-ray Systems Inc." The model number BR 60-75 appears on a white label.

Class shooting injures student

WICHITA — A 14-year-old Wichita North High School student was hospitalized in fair condition Thursday following what police said was an accidental shooting in a ninth grade classroom.

Lt. Richard Vinroe said a student was playing with a .22-caliber pistol in class when it discharged and struck the boy sitting in front of him.

Teachers vote to increase pay

OTTAWA — Ottawa teachers have voted to accept a contract agreement with the school district, ending negotiations that began in February.

Teachers voted 88-6 to approve the agreement providing a 5 percent pay increase. The Ottawa Board of Education had ratified the agreement earlier this week.

Salary for a beginning teacher would increase from $14,590 a year to $16,000 in the new contract. Top scale for a teacher with college credit beyond a master's degree and 17 years experience goes from $27,632 to $28,197.

The protracted negotiations included sessions with a federal mediator and a state fact-finder.

For the first time in more than a century, bison returned to the Flint Hills areas near Manhattan. Thirty bison were released onto the Konza Prairie-

Research Natural Area on Oct. 19 as part of a long-term research project to study the effects of native grazers on the prairie.

Konza prairie new home for bison

By Sandra M. Siebert
Contributing Writer

At first the animals seemed reluctant to leave. The corral, after all, offered a steady supply of food and water. Someone began to coax them with a trail of food thrown off the back of a battered, green pick-up. Urged by hand-clapping and coat-waving at the other end of the corral, the shaggy, brown animals moved slowly toward the gate.

Once outside the gate, the animals seemed to pick up on the excitement of the small group of people observing them from the other side of the fence. The beasts pranced and rolled in the dirt, then turned and ran, disappearing among the hills. For the first time in more than a century, bison returned to the Flint Hills area just outside of Manhattan.

Brought from Fort Riley, where a herd is maintained in connection with the Cavalry Museum, the 30 bison were released onto the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area on Oct. 19 as one stage of a long-term research project to study the effects of native grazers on the prairie. The studies on the Konza are conducted by scientists at K-State.

The Army donated the animals to Konza because the herd at Fort Riley was getting too large for the 200 acres it was on, said Dave Hartnett, assistant professor of biology.

There are plans to purchase two adult bulls to place with the herd, which is made up of cows, steers, and calves of both sexes, Hartnett said. The two bulls are being purchased from another source because the Fort Riley herd has been genetically isolated for many years, he added. Genetic isolation may result in a prevalence of genetic defects.

The bison were moved over a period of two days the week before they were released onto Konza. Each animal was vaccinated while being loaded onto the closed-top trailers. Blood samples were also taken to determine if the herd was starting with any health problems, Hartnett said. No problems were found.

The bison were kept in a corral at Konza for several days before being released on the prairie.

"With all the distress from moving them, before we just let them loose we wanted to get them all together and let them settle down," Hartnett said. "Also (we wanted) to watch them for a couple of days just in case there were any injury problems or sickness problems among the animals."

It will be very difficult to locate the animals on the more than 1,100 acres of hilly area they are now on, he said.

Six and one-half miles of fence, eight feet tall, made of smooth, high tensile wire — which can be stretched without breaking — surrounds the area where the bison are kept. Four of the 15 strands of the fence are electrified.

"It is electrified to provide a psychological barrier to the animals," said Joe Gelroth, site manager for Konza.

If the animals are really determined to get through the fence they can, and the electrical charge won't hurt them, Gelroth said. It is a matter of "if you had your druthers, you'd just as soon not get shocked again today."

The bison's natural herding instincts will also work to keep the bison from going through the fence.

"As long as the herd is inside the fence there is really no social reason for animals to be on the other side of the fence," Gelroth said. "The rest of the herd might go away and leave them."

Eventually the area the bison are on will be increased to 2,400 acres, he said. Once enough data has been obtained to determine what effect the bison are having on the prairie elk — once native to Kansas — pronghorn antelope will be released into the same area to study their effect on the ecosystem.

New adviser plans procedures for board

By Andrew Jones
Contributing Writer

The position of legal adviser for the judicial branch of the Student Governing Association has been delegated to Sally Routson, whose duties will run concurrently with her present position as Student Activities Coordinator.

Routson, who has held her position of coordinator since 1982, was named to also assume the responsibilities of legal adviser beginning in October.

As the new legal adviser, Routson's primary purpose will be to oversee procedures of the various judicial boards and ensure they are operating fairly.

"I can offer suggestions for sanctions and bring up various considerations for the boards on different cases — explaining certain decisions and sanctions that were handed down in past cases," Routson said.

Besides offering recommendations and instructions about the proper procedures, Routson will have the power to destroy judicial records that have been on file for at least four years.

Routson is assuming the vacancy by Bill Arck, who resigned to take on the position of Director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services. The restructuring — putting Routson in the legal adviser position — gives the SGA a congruent sense as a leadership and advisory organization, Routson said. She now serves as the adviser for all three branches of student government. She has previously been serving as the adviser of the legislative and executive branches.

"Since I already work with the executive and legislative branches, it makes sense that I also work the judicial branch — although there is an added responsibility," Routson said.

She said she is looking forward to her new assignment because it will put her in contact with even more students.

Reporters uncover candidates' 'pasts'

Dear Voting Public,

The 1987 American presidential race has taught all good citizens to look deep into the background of every individual who seeks any elected office. It does not matter if any of the information is relevant to the job which the candidate is seeking. It does not matter that the voters are also mistake-prone human beings. It does not even matter if the rumors are true or make believe. All that matters is that the voters get some fresh gossip.

Let us suppose that the Collegian assigned a crew of reporters to look into the backgrounds of the candidates running for student body president. Would they uncover hideous material? Would they be so disgusted as to give up on investigative journalism and go into chemical engineering or zoology? Would they quit with a closing statement which reads like, "I used to think that some of the candidates for president of the United States have bad backgrounds: premarital sex, extramarital affairs, and basic plagiarism; but their records are as clean as a baby's bottom when compared to the records of the 'three musketeers' who are running for student body president."

I don't know what they would come up with. Maybe it would be something like this:

■ Troy Lubbers, junior in business administration, is a candidate for student body president. He thinks the crimes he committed in the past aren't going to come back and haunt him. He is wrong.

When Troy was in first grade, he was a bad cursive writer. He never sat with both feet flat on the floor. He never tilted his paper slightly to the left. He never cared. During parent-teacher conferences his teacher would always say, "Troy is a nice boy, but his F's, U's, C's and T's leave a little bit to be desired."

Once, candidate Lubbers was assigned the simple task of cleaning the blackboard erasers. He went outside behind the building and proceeded to beat the erasers together. Then he got a bright idea: Wouldn't it be funny to hit them on the building and make a dirty word out of the chalk? It was funny, until Mr. Ricketmonster, the principal, saw it. Then Mr. Ricketmonster got to have the last laugh.

But this is all child's play compared to the time he smashed three flies in his teacher's class planner. He circled each of them with her red pen and wrote, "Today the flies, tomorrow your family!" He wasn't yet at the age when all school children realize the teacher can tell their handwriting from that of their classmates. But the next day he was.

■ Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics, wants to be the next student body president. Maybe his actions in college make him qualified for the job, but his actions in elementary school certainly do not.

During his grade school career, Pat was never a member of the clean plate club. One of his grade cards lists the foods that the stubborn second-grader refused to eat — broccoli, spinach, liver and onions, kidney beans, and cook's surprise. Several times he was caught cramming food into his milk carton and jamming the carton on the braces beneath the table. (He was the fastest milk drinker in both first and second grades.) Weeks later he would pull the cartons out from under the table and say, "Ooooooooh, who did this?"

One Halloween he went trick-or-treating dressed up like Moammar Gadhafi. Instead of chanting the traditional "trick or treat, smell my feet, give me something good to eat," he chanted "give me food, that tastes good, or I'll put a bomb beneath your hood." Candidate Muir received so much candy that season, he didn't have to eat school lunches for an entire month.

And last, but not worst is the subject of food fights. Pat held the third-grade record for number of direct hits of a teacher with a lima bean before getting a spanking — 67. Still today, he has the all-school record for number of peas put on a classmate's chair before he or she sits down — 1,457 and counting.

■ Jack Taylor, junior in arts and sciences, is running for student body president. He thinks that no one will go back and find all of the skeletons in his closet. He forgets that today is the day before Halloween — the traditional date when old, forgotten skeletons come to life. He won't forget next year.

As a youngster of about 10 or 11, Jack was an excessive chair tilter. Despite the warnings, despite the threats, he would continue to tilt his chair back onto two legs. Even when his teacher offered him the "big-tilter-ultimatum" of cutting off the front legs and seeing how he liked it then, he continued his rebellious behavior.

Candidate Taylor was also a terror on the kickball field. Not a game would go by without the wily youngster sneaking up on a group of unsuspecting kickballers. He would pretend to play with them for a few minutes. But as soon as the teacher turned her back — "Terror Taylor" had stolen another kickball and was running towards the playground fence to toss it over. Of course his classmates were not stupid, he only got away with it the first 20 or 30 times.

Despite his various discipline problems, Jack was, and probably still is, the best spitter in his grade school. His favorite trick was to sneak up behind a couple of teachers who were talking and spit over their heads. The teachers always thought it was a bird and were amazed how close the "doodoo" had gotten. Then, one day, he misjudged the wind.

On the other hand, the candidates could have perfect records — but that would have made a very boring column!

UNICEF helps children with worldwide giving

During this time of All Hallows' Eve, Halloween to most, children will be trick-or-treating and asking for more than just a piece of candy. Some children will be holding a small carton for monetary donations for the United Nations Children's Fund.

When these children ask for money, think about the children around the world who are starving. Remember the 1.5 million children UNICEF saved last year by assisting with nutrition programs, providing vaccines, building water supply systems and providing emergency relief to the victims of natural disasters. These are just a few of the reasons to contribute to UNICEF.

UNICEF is partly funded by congress, and recognized around the world for its efforts to aid children and help alleviate pain and suffering.

UNICEF's aid in the past has helped millions, but every day nearly 40,000 children die from preventable childhood diseases. UNICEF is committed to universal immunization from childhood diseases by the year 1990.

But this help cannot continue without our support. And a quarter or a dollar may not seem like much to most people, but this small amount could save a child's life.

So, when that trick-or-treater ghost or goblin asks for candy and/or money for UNICEF, go find some spare change. Because your spare change is these children's lifeblood.

Help a good cause, donate to the UNICEF.

Safety most important for Halloween season

As Halloween nears, so does the attention spent on educating the public on Halloween safety.

Each year, following a child's successful Halloween candy "haul," a few unfortunate children are sent to emergency rooms. They have usually ingested candy which had been laced with harmful substances, including razor blades, arsenic or cyanide.

And around the country, a cry is heard that Halloween is for children.

Most people enjoy handing out candy to the children who, dressed in festive costumes, come to the door and say "Trick-or-Treat."

It is those individuals who cause so much pain for the unfortunate few, that the majority must be aware. Parents must remember to take their children only to homes of people they know, let children eat only the candy with intact wrappers, and throw out any foods not in a wrapper.

Parents can also take advantage of the myriad of "safe" trick-or-treating options. These include taking your child to the Manhattan Town Center from 6 to 8 p.m. and feeling secure the stores are providing safe treats. Another option is to take your child to one of the sorority- or fraternity-sponsored events happening that evening for children.

But don't forget, safety also depends on how well the children can be seen on dark streets. It would be best if the children were done trick-or-treating by dark, but if not, make sure the children are wearing reflective clothing.

TEEN PROBLEMS—yesterday:

today:

Religion subject to human error, only physical shell around spirit

The year John Lennon died, I was a freshman at Georgetown University, a Jesuit school in Washington, D.C. The day after his death, a small memorial service was held for him at the university chapel. The presiding priest, a bearded relic of the 60s, eulogized Lennon, emphasizing the former Beatle's dedication to peace. During the homily, snatches of Lennon tunes were played over the loudspeaker. I knew what was coming for the finale. As we all sat in meditative silence, the loudspeaker hummed forth the first lilting notes of the song "Imagine." John Lennon, like the proverbial voice from the grave, called us to "Imagine there's no heaven. It's easy if you try..."

My attention, however, was on the priest. He was listening with closed-eyed rapture to Lennon's musical agenda. It was comical. Here was this man — a Jesuit priest on the payroll of a Catholic institution — presiding over a chapel service that was demanding the overthrow of God and religion. He had obviously, at one time, ingested too much LSD. He was both hypocritical and naive.

Needless to say, these memories with all their cynicism came rushing back when I read Mike Krueger's commentary, "Religion delays peace" in the Aug. 27 Collegian. I can't help but think that, when it comes to analyzing the facts about religion, Krueger chose the same method as Lennon: imagination.

In the course of his commentary, he took uninformed potshots at biblical translation, Christian ethics, corporate worship and religious contributions. Let me, however, limit my response to the topic of religion and peace.

Krueger failed to admit that irreligion is also capable of violence. The government of the French Revolution, avowedly anticlerical, brutalized its countrymen during the Reign of Terror. One party termed that violence "de-Christianization" and instituted the Cult of Reason. We also see violence springing from modern atheistic, or secular, states. China had its Cultural Revolution. The Soviet Union has had its purges, pogroms and

LOWELL
BLISS

invasions, all in the name of an ideology devoted to liberating people from the opiate of the masses.

I also take exception to the examples Krueger used to demonstrate religiously induced violence. In most all of the cases mentioned, religion was used as a convenient mask to hide deeper political and nationalistic motives. For instance, the fighting in Ireland between the Catholics and the Protestants is hardly over church doctrine. Its roots are racial, embedded in British colonialism. The "800-year" Iran-Iraq war was being fought long before the propaganda of Khomeini's jihad. The two nations have clashed over border disputes and Kurdish autonomy.

Granted, there are examples of religiously shed blood. Yet I ask: Is this violence the result of religion itself, or is it the result of the abuse of religion? Since irreligion is also capable of violence, would it not be accurate to say that anything about which man feels strongly is susceptible to abuse? In fact, is it not true that the higher the good, the more terrible are its perversions?

At the heart of most world religions are doctrines of love, compassion and peace. If we want to talk about intrinsic abuse, I would contend that irreligion, or secularism, is more fertile ground. It can never quite get away from its Darwinian roots of survival of the fittest and appeasement of self. As one result, abortion — which places quality of life above sanctity of life — is responsible for more deaths in 14 years than religious violence has accomplished in the entire history of Christianity.

I do not want to entrench myself too deeply in the role of defending religion. Religion is essentially the physical shell around the spiritual reality. As such, it is subject to all the abuses and foibles of the humans who operate within it. In addition, I do not intend to defend all the religions of the world. Yet, if it is dedication to peace that Krueger wants, then he can find numerous examples in religious circles. There are the ethical teachings of Jesus Christ, the prince of peace. There are such groups as the Quakers and such people as Mother Teresa.

When Krueger claims that religion gives more than it takes, he needs to recognize that such things as hospitals, universities and the Declaration of Independence owe their origins to religion. Even science, that vaunted goddess of the secular society, was born out of the religious notion that the universe is ordered and, thus, knowable.

My most important question to Krueger is this: Just what are you proposing? It is naive to place the entire blame for the strife-torn planet on religion. It is even more naive to believe that religion's elimination can be a topic for discussion.

You admit that "we cannot get away from religion." The reason this is true is because man is a religious animal. By our nature, each of us worships, serves and sacrifices to someone or something outside of ourselves. We have names for all these religions: Christianity, Islam, statism, materialism, hedonism, naturalism and narcissism. We have names for all their gods: Jehovah, Allah, the state, money, pleasure, science and self. When you go about "developing your own standards," Krueger, you are basically creating your own religion. Go ahead. Call it kruegerism, since you desire part of its godhead. But call it what it is — religion — and take guard against its abuses. I pity, though, your disillusionment when you come to realize that even kruegerism is just a sect of a larger system of "religious" thought.

"Benjamin Franklin Signing the Constitution" is one of 15 displays in Farrell Library's pumpkin decorating contest. The pumpkins will be on display in the library today for judging.

Pumpkins invade Farrell halls

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Collegian Reporter

If you walk into the hall near Farrell Library's sorting department you will find a woman with a seductive smile primping in a black-and-white swimsuit and white stockings.

In the library's government documents department office, a portly, graying man with spectacles and a wrinkled brow who looks suspiciously like Benjamin Franklin is signing the Constitution.

Despite their physical differences, these two people have one very important feature in common — their heads are made of pumpkins.

These two figures and others like them on display throughout Farrell were set up for the annual Pumpkin Decorating Contest, held internally among the various departments in Farrell.

Lois Kuyper-Rushing, president of the Library Staff Association and director of the contest, said there are about fifteen departments participating in the contest this year.

"It usually involves more than just a pumpkin," she said.

Competition is fierce, but friendly. Not all of the displays are set up at the same time due to restraints imposed on the employees trying to complete daily tasks, Kuyper-Rushing said.

Several of the departments, however, are being deliberately secretive with their displays until judging time so their concepts won't be copied.

She said the displays have to be up by 8 a.m. today when the judging is scheduled to begin.

The three judges for the contest are people who are related in some way to the people on the Farrell staff but are not members of the staff themselves, Kuyper-Rushing said.

"The judging is based on the overall effect. There are no categories and no criteria, exactly — just the one that is the most original, the cutest and has the best effect on the judges," Kuyper-Rushing said.

Dow Jones up 91½ points in third-largest gain ever

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Wall Street regained a measure of its lost vitality Thursday, drawing a second wind that blew the Dow Jones industrial average up more than 90 points in its third-largest gain ever.

The Dow average closed up 91.51 points at 1,938.33. The average regained 5 percent of its value after struggling to a mere 0.33-point gain Wednesday.

The broader market, which had lagged behind the blue-chip issues represented in the Dow, also improved with four stocks making money for every one that lost.

The market moved steadily higher despite a drop in the dollar and losses on stock exchanges in the Far East.

The market value of American stocks, as measured by Wilshire Associates, rose $106.57 billion, or 4.73 percent, to $2.36 trillion after. On Wednesday, stocks fell $12 billion.

Volume came to 258.14 million shares as trading again ended at 2 p.m. Markets have been closing two hours early to allow people to catch up on paperwork, and will have shortened hours again Friday.

It was not immediately known whether the exchanges would return to their normal closing times on Monday.

"The market seemed quite orderly," said Jack Garry, an analyst with Butcher & Singer Inc. in Philadelphia. "It was not as frantic today as we've seen over the last week and a half" since the market's $500 billion collapse Oct. 19.

But other analysts remained wary.

"I see some stabilizing, but we've still got some problems out there," said Ronald B. Doran, head of institutional trading for First Albany Corp. He cautioned that despite Thursday's performance, the market remains vulnerable to fluctuations in the dollar.

The dollar slid to new lows overseas and also fell in New York, although central banks intervened to support it by buying the currency on the open market.

Traders said the dollar fell because of a market conviction that the Reagan administration was not firmly committed to a February agreement to stabilize exchange rates.

In Tokyo, the dollar sank to its lowest level since the late 1940s against the Japanese yen, closing at 137.55 yen, down from 140.75 yen on Wednesday. In Europe, the dollar reached a seven-year low against the West German mark and Dutch guilder, five-year lows against the British pound, French franc and Italian lire and post-World War II lows against the Swiss franc.

In New York, the dollar closed mixed against the major currencies. It was quoted at 138.30 yen late Thursday, down from 138.75 yen Wednesday, and also fell against the West German mark. It rose against the British pound, Swiss and French francs and the Canadian dollar.

A call by French Finance Minister Edouard Balladur for a meeting of the seven major industrial nations to discuss the dollar may have helped the U.S. currency, said James Vick, a vice president at Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co.

Although the lower dollar carries the possibility of higher inflation and higher interest rates, the stock market may see the currency's decline as positive, said A.C. Moore, an analyst with Argus Research Corp., because it "is associated with help for our export industry."

Ouija: link to other world

By Linda Huddleston
Collegian Reporter

Almost everyone has heard Halloween stories about seances and other forms of communication with the spirits, but few have actually dared to delve into the past by using a tool that has been around since the Middle Ages — the Ouija board.

The Ouija board, which originated in Central Europe more than 900 years ago, has a smooth surface with letters, symbols, digits and the words "yes" and "no." When two people rest their hands on the slider or planchette — a pointed platform on casters — involuntary or voluntary movement occurs when a question is asked. The people using the board act as vessels through which spirits and extra-dimensional creatures communicate.

The Ouija board has an interesting history involving witches, gypsies and other spiritualists, said Ron Crawford, an employee of the Master Gamer, a science-fiction and fantasy store in Manhattan that neither sells nor endorses occultic material.

Since high school, Crawford has been interested in Ouija boards and Tarot cards, which are used to tell the future.

"The Ouija board was used to tap

"The Ouija board was used to tap into other planes and dimensions. Its key use was to communicate with the dead."

—Ron Crawford

into other planes and dimensions," Crawford said. "Its key use was to communicate with the dead."

In the Victorian times, the Ouija board was used by spiritualists as a parlor game. Royalty and wealthy citizens would pay large amounts of gold and silver to spiritualists for answers from the board. When the settlers came to America, they brought along the Ouija board to continue their occultic practices.

Soon after arriving, the pioneers practiced only in secrecy because of the severity of the Salem witch trials. It was during this time the gypsies, witches and other spiritualists were condemned and severely punished for communicating with other-dimensional powers.

It wasn't until the 1940s and '50s that the Ouija board became an acceptable tool used across the United States, Crawford said. The board gained popularity in the '60s and '70s, but now it is not in high demand.

"Around Halloween there is a larger market for the boards, but otherwise, the demand is low," Crawford said. "After hearing stories and seeing movies about the boards, some people are afraid and won't deal with them."

Crawford said demand for the boards are also affected by a few popular myths. The first is the belief the boards are illegal.

"Even though Ouija boards aren't illegal, some counties pass laws barring occultic materials from stores," Crawford said. "It is usually public pressure from religious groups and parents that keep the boards out of stores."

Another misconception is there are two types of boards — the "harmless" ones purchased at local discount stores, and the "real" ones bought from specialty shops dealing in occultic material.

"Most people don't realize that any Ouija board, regardless of its cost, works in the same way," Crawford said. "People can subconsciously interpret the board's answers to fit the questions they ask, regardless of the situation or the board used."

Ouija boards are also often associated with parapsychology and extrasensory perception. However, according to Thaddeus Cowan, professor of psychology, few significant studies on the boards have been done.

"Psychologists just don't address the subject because more important research needs to be done," Cowan said. "Ouija boards are not related to ESP or other forms of telepathy. It's hard to believe the two people involved in the game are naive; meaning one wasn't forcing an answer on the other by facial expressions or body motions. In most cases, unexplained movement is just not going to occur."

Crawford said the Ouija board itself is a tool which is neither good nor evil.

"The board only has as much power, influence and direction as you let it have," Crawford said. "Some people really get into this stuff, and others think it's garbage. Religious beliefs and social influences have a lot to do with communicating with other-dimensional powers. The outcome is dependent on the person's belief."

Ballgown, Dracula costumes hot items this spooky season

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Romance and horror, not necessarily combined, are the hot themes for adults dressing up this Halloween, partly because "people want to get their mind off the stock market," a leading costumer said Thursday.

"There's a degree of escapism," added Mark Beige, president of Rubie's Costume Co. in Queens, which also outfits off-Broadway and television shows.

"Everything in the Romantic period is going like hotcakes," agreed Jeanette Centrowitz, co-owner of Universal Costumes in Manhattan's theater district.

"We have ballgowns going out the door one after the other," she said. "The men are very much into musketeer outfits and Amadeus."

In previous years, said Centrowitz, "I had women walking around wearing Michael Jackson jackets and men's pirate costumes." But now, she said, women want traditionally feminine costumes and "men are wearing sequins, pink, ruffles and knickers."

Beige said many of his female customers will be dressing as harem girls, French maids, sorceresses or "she-devils." The men want to be Dracula, a gorilla or one of the Three Musketeers.

A costume that leaves little to the imagination was modeled Thursday by Elvira, the Los Angeles television personality who presides over a "creature feature" show.

During a visit to Rockefeller Center, she drew stares in her signature attire: garish makeup, a clingy black dress with a slit to the hips and a dangerously low neckline, a dagger belt buckle and black nail polish.

Elvira has marketed the outfit as a Halloween costume. So what will she wear?

"I thought I might do a complete reversal and go as Marie Osmond," she said.

Horror-movie monsters are a heavy influence this Halloween, said Beige: especially Jason from "Friday the 13th" and Freddie Krueger from "Nightmare on Elm Street."

Masks of two real-life characters, Richard Nixon and the Ayatollah Khomeini, are "somewhat popular."

What will Beige be going as on Halloween? "I'm going to sleep. I'm going to need it by Saturday night."

Mike Burke, owner of ABC Costume Corp. in Brooklyn, which stocked 3,000 fantasies for the season, said his biggest themes are pirates, French maids, Dracula and horror-movie monsters.

Jim and Tammy Faye Bakker masks were doing "pretty fair." But there was no Oliver North, because Halloween masks were manufactured too early in the year to take advantage of that potential trend, he said.

State's Democratic executive resigns

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The executive director of the state Democratic Party has resigned effective Sunday, state party Chairman Jim Parrish announced Thursday.

Alma Webster was the party's executive director for nearly two years. Webster resigned because of the long hours required in the job and because she wanted to "relieve some of the pressure," Parrish said in a statement.

Parrish also announced that he has appointed Joseph Scranton as acting executive director. Scranton has been the party's director of fundraising for the last 10 months, and he managed the 1986 campaign of former Rep. Judy Runnels, who ran unsuccessfully for secretary of state.

Scranton also is a graphic artist.

Parrish said Webster had agreed to remain active in the party on a volunteer basis and to work at its Topeka headquarters part-time to assist in the transition.

Webster was named executive director of the party in December 1985, after serving six months as the manager of the party's Topeka office. Before that, she worked in the payroll department of the Landmark Hotel Corp.

"She saw the party through a difficult election year in 1986 and has done a fine job of positioning the party to come back strong in 1988," Parrish said.

Halloween

HORRORS

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reporter

A bloody rubber hand with a butcher knife stuck in it sits on the counter of a video rental store to promote the latest horror movie release for Halloween.

"Horror movies are always pretty popular," said Karla Dugan, junior in business and an employee of National Video in Westloop.

"But before Halloween they are really popular."

The Video Exchange in Aggieville boasts "A Bloody Good Time" for their 31-cent rental fee on all horror movies on Halloween. They are also offering free popcorn for all of their members and treats for all young trick-or-treaters. However, if customers want to be sure to get their favorite scary movies, they should get there early, because The Video Exchange will not take reservations the night before Halloween.

It seems that Halloween brings out some of the worst in movies, but sometimes the worst is the best when it comes to being scared. "The Texas Chainsaw Massacre," "Frankenstein," "Psycho," "The Mutilator" and "The House on Sorority Row" are the most popular movies this time of the year.

"Rentals of horror movies have picked up quite a bit," said Robert Hampton, employee at The Video Exchange.

"There have been some new releases that have just come out, but the most popular ones seem to be 'Halloween' and 'Friday The Thirteenth.'"

So why are horror movies are so popular? Do people really like to be scared so much that they will go out and rent a movie, so that they can sleep with the lights on for a week? The reasons for renting horror movies vary as much as the movies do.

"I love them," said Kristi Roe, sophomore in journalism, "I don't like the ones that are all gore. My favorite one is called 'Witchboard.' It is all about ouija boards. I like it because it is intriguing and it makes me want to know more about the history of the ouija board."

"I'm scared very easily," said

Telling ghost stories remains an important tradition

By Karen Allen
Collegian Reporter

A young woman clad in a lavender coat stood in the rain on a deserted highway near Wamego, Kan. She flagged a passing car occupied by two fraternity members and asked them for a ride. They took her to a small farmhouse, where one of the men returned about a week later to ask her to a party. He was greeted by an older lady who told him that her daughter had been dead for several years. The lady directed the unbelieving man to a graveyard, where he found the young woman's grave. On it was draped a lavender coat.

This is one version of a ghost story titled "The Vanishing Hitchhiker," said William Koch, a retired associate professor of English who has taught classes on folklore. The story is known across Europe and the United States, he said.

The practice of telling ghost stories can be traced back to the early Indo-European Celts, according to the "American Book of Days" by Jane M. Hatch.

At the end of summer, the Celts celebrated their bountiful harvest by honoring the "sun god". They would light a fire to offer moral support to the sun and to chase away the oncoming darkness and evil spirits. All the souls who had died during the year were thought to roam about at the end of harvest searching for a resting place.

The idea of spirits coming to call spread after the Catholic church declared Nov. 1 All Saints' or All Hallows' day. People thought the spirits were out in full force the day before — Oct. 31 — because they had to play second fiddle to the saints the next day. Some believed Satan called the spirits together to mock the ceremony of the saints. Others were convinced the spirits had come to foreshadow the future for relatives they left behind.

Families and friends would huddle together for fear of having to face the spirits alone. The spirits were believed to be notorious pranksters. No one dared to sleep, so they passed the time sharing personal encounters with scary noises and spooky shadows.

Gradually it became a practice to gather on All Hallows' Eve to eat, drink and swap ghoulish stories.

Modern day ghost stories are considered legends, Koch said.

"They are legends involving the supernatural," he said, adding that a legend is based on an incident that happened at a certain time and place.

Koch co-published a book on Kansas folklore and legends in 1961. The story of a supposed haunted stone house in Manhattan was reprinted from a newspaper dated 1887. Every town or village had a few ghost stories to tell, he said.

People enjoy ghost stories because they are about the "unexplainable," Koch said.

"You can't make up a ghost story," he said, adding that true ghost stories are accounts of people actually seeing the soul or spirit of a dead person.

Koch has given up arguing with people over the existence of ghosts. People that haven't seen one usually don't believe in them, he said.

Student Senate adds polling sites

By Jill Conger
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate approved the addition of two new polling places after two hours of debate at its meeting Thursday evening.

The new polling places will be located in Cardwell Hall and Derby Food Center — instead of Ackert Hall and Farrell Library. The current polling places are the K-State Union and the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

"The reason for increasing polling places is the hope that there will be a higher voting turnout and therefore provide better representation," said Kent Bradley, student body president and senior in nutrition science.

During debate on the polling issue, concerns were expressed about space requirements and the need for the locations to adequately represent the campus.

"I really don't think that there is enough room in the lobby of Ackert Hall to provide for a polling place," said Scott Shuey, agricultural senator and a junior in pre-veterinary medicine.

Michelle Benoit, Senate chairwoman and a senior in agricultural economics, said she wanted to try something new that would make a difference — namely, adding more polling areas.

The adoption of this proposal will not take effect, however, until the 1988 student government elections.

The Senate voted to approve the Constitutional amendments. One policy will establish the appointed Chief of Staff as the successor to the Student Body President in the event the president could not fulfill the duties of that office.

In other business, Student Senate decided to table the discussion of a special allocation for the Black Student Union's Big Eight conference until next week's meeting.

Next week, senators will be voting on a task force to provide recommendations to Senate about the sale of student football and basketball tickets. Doug Folk, junior in electrical engineering and sponsor of the bill, said the task force would examine all previous policies of ticket sales and develop a new policy which is fair and workable.

Meeting of superpowers may be held in December

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The superpowers agreed on a summit agenda and cleared the way for Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev to meet President Reagan in the United States later this year, a Soviet spokesman said Thursday.

No date was announced, but one official said privately that the Soviets are proposing the two leaders meet the first week in December.

U.S. officials, also speaking on condition of anonymity, said the third meeting between Reagan and Gorbachev could be arranged for late November or early December.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Boris D. Pyadyshv told reporters the leaders would sign a treaty to scrap intermediate-range nuclear missiles and discuss cuts in long-range strategic arsenals.

He said they also would discuss limits on developing the proposed U.S. space-based missile defense program known as "Star Wars." The Soviet-U.S. dispute over the system prevented agreement on a summit date during Secretary of State George P. Shultz's visit to Moscow last week.

Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, carrying a letter from the Soviet Communist Party general secretary to Reagan, was to arrive in Washington on Friday for further talks. The Soviet official said the letter contains the proposal for a summit date.

Shevardnadze was in Prague, Czechoslovakia, Thursday to meet with Warsaw Pact foreign ministers.

"Presently, we have an understanding that together with the agreement on medium-range and shorter-range missiles, questions relative to strategic offensive weapons and the ABM (anti-ballistic missile) treaty will be thoroughly discussed at a summit meeting," Pyadyshv said. "This is sufficient for a summit to take place this year."

He said a summit "is fixed for the end of this year."

In Washington, Reagan said the date of the summit had not been set and said the timing would have to wait for the talks with Shevardnadze.

Pyadyshv denied there had been any change in the Soviet position since Friday, when Gorbachev refused to set a summit date. But he said U.S. and Soviet officials accomplished "good and constructive work" after Shultz's meetings last week with the Soviet leadership in Moscow.

During his meeting with Shultz, Gorbachev said he was not yet satisfied there had been sufficient progress on the Star Wars dispute to warrant another meeting with Reagan.

The president's determination to proceed with Star Wars, the proposed shield against nuclear attack called the Strategic Defense Initiative, and Soviet opposition to the program scuttled agreement at the Reykjavik summit a year ago.

Pyadyshv said the final draft of a treaty banning intermediate-range missiles is only a week or two from completion, increasing pressure for progress on the thornier issues of long-range missiles and space weaponry.

"Right now the situation is such that we must not lose the momentum in Soviet-American dialogue," he said.

Reagan and Gorbachev first met in Geneva, Switzerland, in November 1985, and agreed to back-to-back summits in 1986 and 1987. Last year, however, Gorba-

Alcohol-related fatalities up; anti-alcohol efforts initiated

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Alcohol-related traffic deaths are increasing after years of steady decline, raising concern the campaign against drinking and driving may be losing momentum, especially among young motorists, a researcher said Thursday.

The statistics from 32 states showed a 7 percent increase last year in the number of deaths among drivers who were legally intoxicated and a similar increase in the number of single-vehicle nighttime fatalities.

Both categories traditionally have been used as key indicators of alcohol-related traffic deaths.

"Even though you can't put it all together, the indicators seem to be going in the same (upward) direction. It's reason for concern," said Professor Ralph Hingson, chief of social and behavioral sciences at Boston University's School of Public Health.

Hingson analyzed U.S. Transportation Department traffic statistics in a recent paper that suggested there was a significant reversal in 1986 in the trend toward fewer alcohol-related traffic fatalities.

"We need to be concerned about whether public attention to the (drunken driving) problem has diminished," Hingson said in a telephone interview.

The statistics prompting Hingson's attention come from the 32 states that perform comprehensive alcohol testing on drivers killed in traffic accidents.

Those statistics show that 5,211 legally intoxicated drivers were killed last year, compared with 4,884 the previous year, an increase of 7 percent. The number of deaths among intoxicated teen-age drivers increased from 478 to 534, a jump of 12 percent.

In both categories, the percentage increase was about twice that found among fatally injured drivers who had not been intoxicated, according to figures examined by Hingson. By comparison, the number of deaths of intoxicated drivers dropped 48 percent between 1980 and 1985.

Hingson said a related statistic, which also is often used as a barometer on alcohol-related traffic deaths, climbed in 1986 as well.

The number of single-vehicle, nighttime traffic deaths involving teen-age drivers jumped 17 percent last year, from 2,408 to 2,820. During the previous five years such deaths had declined about 35 percent.

Single-vehicle, nighttime highway fatalities among all age groups increased by 7 percent from 14,603 to 15,663 in 1986 after several years of decline.

Last year, 46,056 people were killed on the nation's roads and highways, about 5 percent more than the 43,795 killed in 1985, the Transportation Department said. About 40 percent of those fatalities were in accidents that involved alcohol in some way.

Women harriers set for Big 8 title run

By Bill Lang
Sports Writer

K-State cross country coach John Capriotti would like only one treat in his trick-or-treat bag this Halloween weekend — a Big Eight Conference title for his women harriers.

Heading into Saturday's conference meet at Norman, Okla., 15th-ranked University of Colorado is the overwhelming favorite among the women. The Lady Buffaloes received six first-place votes and one second-place vote. The Wildcats, ranked 17th, garnered five second-place and two first-place votes.

Not to be counted out is the University of Nebraska, ranked 19th. Capriotti predicted a successful weekend, even though his squad was seeded second.

"Colorado is the No. 1 team, no doubt, but we've been coming up to their level (of running) for quite a while," Capriotti said. "We've beaten them before and I feel we can run with them again and beat them again. It's going to be a war out there."

K-State's women defeated Colorado on Oct. 9th, 34-35, at the Oklahoma Sooners Invitational. It was the same course the Big Eight meet is being run on this weekend.

"It's an advantage for us to be running on the same course," Capriotti said. "We're familiar with (the course) and that should help us when it comes time to run. The women are going down there and are going to run a very tough race."

K-State's women finished first at both the Missouri Mid-America Open and the Sooner Invitational, while placing second at Iowa State. The team has been paced by junior Laura Haggerty who posted both a first- and a second-place finish before missing the squad's final regular-season meet with a sore Achilles' tendon.

the prediction for K-State to finish fourth or fifth is about right.

"We started the season out real good," he said of the men's first-place finish at the University of Iowa Invitational on Sept. 26. "But since then, we haven't been able to run that well. We're sending out a young team and one that is quite inexperienced."

K-State's men will be without the services of sophomore David Warders due to a bout with mononucleosis.

"After losing Warders for a while, I thought (the men's team) was going to go downhill," Capriotti said. "We also have five guys who are red-shirted...We haven't fallen off that much, though. We should finish right where the coaches predicted us to."

Others to watch for from K-State include Brian Zwhalen, Phil Byrne and David Keller. Iowa State is the favorite in the men's division.

Colorado took the men's title last season with 37 points, followed by Nebraska with 64 and Iowa State with 68. K-State's men finished fifth.

Capriotti added that both his teams can do well if they run as a team.

"Right now I believe that we can come home with a women's title," he said. "We're just as good as Colorado and they know it. In the women's division, it's going to be a war."

"The men can finish in the top three," he added. "They just have to run harder than they ever have. The Big Eight meet is a meet where one can't lie down. If we do that, we'll just get eaten up. The Big Eight is a good cross country conference — better than everyone thinks or knows."

"Colorado is the No. 1 team, no doubt, but we've been coming up to their level (of running) for quite a while. We've beaten them before and I feel we can run with them again. It's going to be a war out there."

—John Capriotti

Haggerty, a junior transfer from the University of Iowa, will have to be successful if the Wildcats are to maintain their tradition of finishing no lower than third since 1975.

Other top runners for the Wildcats have been senior Anne Stadler, who Capriotti said is having her best season ever, and Alysun Deckert, who has finished in the top 10 at every meet.

Last year, Oklahoma State's women won the title at Warner Park in Manhattan with 49 points. K-State's women took second with 57 and Colorado placed third with 63. On the men's side, Capriotti said Athletic Director Larry Travis gives the cross country team and Coach John Capriotti, left, a short pep talk before practice Thursday in preparation for the Big Eight Conference meet this weekend in Norman, Okla. Both the men and women are hoping for a strong finish.

Publicizing Heisman candidate takes money, marketing skills

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

It's not an easy task to publicize a Heisman Trophy candidate.

Oklahoma State University running back Thurman Thomas leads the Big Eight Conference and ranks 12th nationally in rushing with 815 yards on 155 carries. After being slowed by arthroscopic knee surgery last season, the 5-foot-11, 195-pound tailback is returning to his sophomore form when he ran for more than 1,600 yards and finished 10th in Heisman balloting.

This season, Oklahoma State's sports information office has produced a four-page flyer — and includes up to two pages weekly in the Cowboys' newsletter — solely on Thomas, in hopes of swaying voters to name the Missouri City, Texas, product as the winner of college football's most coveted award.

Oklahoma State sports information director Steve Buzzard said more than $2,000 will be spent on Thomas' Heisman campaign. This doesn't include mailing Thomas' accolades on a weekly basis to about 1,500 media markets nationwide.

After the subpar, injury-slowed season last year when he rushed for a career-low 741 yards, Thomas rushed for more than 100 yards in his first five games including a season-high 193 yards against Wyoming. Oklahoma State, though, didn't mail out the flyer until the fourth week of the season.

"I wouldn't call it a late start, but we felt that Thurman had something to prove after last season," Buzzard said. "After the first few games, we knew where he was heading."

The flyer, titled "Thurman Thomas — Back in the Heisman Hunt," is advertising in its purest form. It says: "Without flowery dialogue and useless adjectives, the best way to describe Thurman Thomas is to quote the statistics."

Along with Thomas' numerous stats from this and past seasons, it includes quotes from University of Colorado coach Bill McCartney and former University of Oklahoma linebacker Brian Bosworth. OSU coach Pat Jones said in the flyer, "a healthy Thurman Thomas is one of the premier running backs in the country."

Performances, not publicity, wins Heismans. Thomas' chances were hindered when he carried the ball only nine times against University of Nebraska — OSU's biggest game to date — and gained just seven yards in a nationally televised contest. It was Thomas' only game with less than 100 yards this season.

Though Thomas could be considered a "dark horse" candidate at best, OSU's sports information director said the Cowboys' leading rusher still has a legitimate chance of taking the trophy.

"I think the voters have to take into consideration who the opposition was. It was fairly obvious early in the game we weren't going to get anywhere rushing against Nebraska. If he would have carried 25 to 30 times,

Travis to stay at K-State

K-State athletic director Larry Travis has turned down the opportunity to become Virginia Tech's athletic director in Blacksburg Va.

After meeting with members of the Virginia Tech selection committee, Travis announced Thursday his decision to stay at K-State.

"My visit with Virginia Tech was not an interview," Travis said. "I was there as a consultant. They wanted to talk about their program and hear my ideas."

Spikers to play at Wichita

K-State's volleyball team dropped to 14-7 overall and 5-4 in the Big Eight Conference with a 15-5, 15-9, 15-0 loss Thursday to Oklahoma in Norman.

In their next competition, the Wildcats will compete today and Saturday in The Wichita State University Invitational.

Tennis team to close season

K-State's women's tennis team will close out its fall dual meet season this weekend with two matches at The Wichita State University. The Wildcats will play Tulsa at 1:30 p.m. Saturday and Wichita State at 9 a.m. Sunday.

Basketball tourney scheduled

Twenty-six teams, 21 men's and five women's, are entered in the first Wildcat Tip-Off Classic Saturday in Ahearn Field House. The three-on-three basketball tournament will get underway at 9 a.m.

The women's title game has been tentatively scheduled for 1:30 p.m., with the men's championship contest to be played sometime after two that afternoon.

Homecoming Part IV:

K-State to play familiar role again

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

It will be the same old story for K-State's football team as it meets Oklahoma State University at 6:30 p.m., Saturday, at Lewis Field in Stillwater.

It's the same old story in that the Wildcats are a homecoming opponent for the fourth time this season. Oklahoma State, 6-1 overall and 2-1 in the Big Eight Conference, will try to make the winless Wildcats the main course for their homecoming celebrations while the 'Cats will try to be anything but a tender meal.

K-State, 0-7 overall and 0-3 in the Big Eight, is still looking for its first victory of the season. Coach Stan Parrish will take his troops into the contest at almost 100 percent strength against a team that has a triple-threat offense.

"We have Marcus Miller back, we have Rob Goode back and we thought Tuesday we lost Dan Hughes in practice but he's back and will make the trip with us, so we're pretty close to 100 percent," Parrish said.

OSU boasts three of the best offensive players in the conference. Senior tailback Thurman Thomas averages 115 yards rushing per contest, Hart Lee Dykes is averaging more than 100 yards in receptions per game from his split end position and Mike Gundy — the top rated quarterback in the Big Eight — is averaging a little more than 230 yards passing per game.

"That's why (Oklahoma State) is six and one," Parrish said. "(Thomas, Gundy and Dykes) are very good. What we're going to try and do is play good overall defense and hit hard and maybe if they get a little sloppy and lay the ball on the ground, we can get some turnovers."

"We've got to get some turnovers and we've got to do some things well early in the game if we're going to win it."

K-State will also need sure-handed ball carriers as they go against the toughest defense in the conference in terms of turnover margin. The Cowboys average three takeaways per game while the 'Cats are giving the ball up just under 2½ times per contest.

Although Oklahoma State has had its problems defensively allowing 436 total yards per game, 214 on the ground and 221.8 through the air, the Cowboys are very stingy when it comes to allowing touchdowns. They have only allowed two first-quarter touchdowns so far this season.

Parrish said to be successful Saturday, K-State's offense will have to make some noise and will have to capitalize on every drive opportunity. While the Cowboy defense has been surrendering yardage, they are only allowing 18.1 points per game.

"We need to try and be more physical this week against Oklahoma State," Parrish said. "We hope to try and control the football against them."

Another part of K-State's offense that hopes to get a shot in the arm this week will be the kicking game. Shane Pouch will handle the punting duties for the 'Cats after a somewhat successful outing in Nebraska last week.

"We have to kick the ball better than what we have been doing," Parrish added. "Poucher gets the first call. He had one bad one last week, but overall he did a pretty good job."

K-State is led on defense by stand-out linebacker Matt Wallerstedt, who leads the conference in tackles with 112. The 'Cats have given up only slightly more yards (474) than their OSU counterparts, but they have also yielded more points than the Cowboy defenders, allowing 41.5 points per contest.

K-State matches up in the trenches pretty well with the Cowboys. There is no decisive edge in the size of the players, but Oklahoma State will have a marked advantage in experience on the front line. All of its big men are upperclassmen, while K-State has three underclassmen on their offensive line.

"I think Stan Parrish has his guys playing real well lately," OSU coach Pat Jones said. "They have had their moments against some of the finer teams in the country this season, and we have been practicing this week with a lot of respect for Kansas State."

Parrish said K-State is hoping to play the spoiler for OSU's homecoming game while being unsuccessful in its last three tries at winning a homecoming outing, including its own against No. 1 Oklahoma.

"We've just kind of gotten use to (playing homecoming games)," Parrish said. "We'll kind of miss it when it ends. You like to have a homecoming game; you feel you're going to win. So, going in I think we're a popular candidate for homecoming."

NOTES: Oklahoma State leads the overall series, 29-12-0...the last time K-State beat the Cowboys was in 1983 when the 'Cats beat OSU 21-20 in Stillwater...K-State's losing streak now stands at 12.

Regents designate holiday

The seven Kansas Board of Regents schools will be making a change on their calendars in the near future. The Collegian learned Thursday Martin Luther King, Jr. Day, a federal holiday, has been designated by the Regents as a holiday to be observed by Regents institutions. Consequently, classes will not be held Jan. 18, 1988, in recognition of the holiday.

Don Foster, K-State registrar, said the University will have class Apr. 18, 1988, the day after Easter traditionally recognized as a University holiday to make up for Martin Luther King, Jr. Day.

Ted D. Ayers, general counsel to the Regents, said the notion the day should be specifically observed on the academic calendar was brought to the attention of the Regents last spring. Ayers said the Regents previously thought the day could be better observed on campuses when classes were in session.

Ayers said each campus would make an individual decision about when to make up a day of classes so the total number of class days does not change.

Debaters second in country

K-State currently ranks second in the nation in intercollegiate competition — not in athletics, but in debate.

In the first fall release of the Cross-Examination Debate Association rankings, K-State's debate squad ranks second behind Southern Illinois University. The rankings include 252 colleges, said Ed Schiappa, K-State debate coach.

"We've had an unusually strong start this year," he said. "Though we do not expect to maintain a No. 2 ranking throughout the year, our season goal of ending the year ranked in the top 10 is clearly within our reach."

Last year, K-State finished 41st in the nation. Schiappa credits the success of this year's 20-member squad to outstanding freshmen debaters and better coaching support.

He said, however, inadequate travel funding for tournament participation may hamper the squad's future success.

"My biggest concern is our budget. It's a third to a half of our major competitor's," Schiappa said. "Our budget this year is $8,500. Last year, it was $9,000 and 10 years ago it was nearly $20,000. As in recruitment of intercollegiate athletics, the size of the program's budget makes a difference in attracting the best debaters."

The squad will compete Saturday at a tournament in Atlanta.

Centers get accreditation

Two child care centers at K-State are among the first in the United States to be accredited by the National Academy of Early Childhood Programs.

The academy recognizes programs which meet national standards of quality in early childhood programs. Both K-State centers, the Early Childhood Laboratory and the Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center, are operated by the Department of Human Development and Family Studies to further its purposes of teaching, research and service.

City limits surrounds University

K-State separate entity from Manhattan

By Jan Schwartz
Collegian Reporter

K-State and Fort Hays State University are the only two Kansas Regents schools not considered to be within the city limits of the community where they are located.

"The University is almost a city within a city," said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

K-State is considered a separate entity from Manhattan, and that presents special circumstances for the University. The campus borders on Anderson, Manhattan and Denison avenues and extends north to include the KSU Stadium and Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Brandenberry Indoor Complex is divided by a city border, and the baseball field to the west of the Complex is the only part of the University considered to be within city limits.

"K-State was once way outside the city, the city grew up around it," said Jim Pearson, assistant city manager. "There has never been any serious discussion of annexing."

The University has its own police force, has a contractual agreement with the Manhattan fire department and is not subject to comply with city building codes or pay city taxes.

Lt. Robert Mellgren of the KSU Police Department said the campus police and the Manhattan city police differ only slightly.

Mellgren said the agency which covers the location of the crime committed takes jurisdiction over the case. He stated the departments consistently "intermingle and work together."

K-State no longer has its own fire department, although at one time it owned its own fire truck and relied on volunteer help.

The University is currently protected by the Manhattan Fire Department and Training Facility which is located on University property.

Fire Chief Bill Smith said the city leases the land with a contractual agreement that ensures fire protection for University buildings.

Smith said before the formal agreement, the fire department would respond to University calls on a need basis.

"If the department was all tied up, the University might not have received any help," Smith said.

Nichols Hall, formerly Nichols Gymnasium, was gutted by fire in 1968, but Smith said it would be unlikely for something similar to happen again with the advanced equipment and strict building codes enforced today.

The University is owned by the State and complies with state building codes. City building codes do not apply to state-owned buildings regardless if the building is within city limits.

"The city has no inspection authority over University buildings," said W. Lawrence Garvin, University architect and director of the facilities planning office.

The state fire marshal inspects the campus buildings every two years and issues a report. Any construction or renovation must be approved by the state architect, Garvin said.

Computer contacts available

By The Collegian Staff

Teachers helping teachers.

That's what the computing center is promoting by setting up a network of key contact people within each department of the University, said Tom Gallagher, director of University Computing Activities. These resource people will provide consulting assistance in the use of the University's computing system.

Each department is encouraged to designate a resource person, Gallagher said. These people will be trained at a higher level of computer competency to interact between the computer and other faculty members in the department.

"There is no way to hire enough people to help everyone," Gallagher said.

By having a person with expertise in each department to answer questions directly, the University will save time and money, he said.

Meese."

People for the American Way, a liberal lobbying group that campaigned against Bork, said Ginsburg's chief qualification "appears to be his adherence to a narrow ideological agenda."

The seat that Ginsburg would fill was vacated when associate justice Lewis Powell announced his retirement June 26. He was considered a swing vote, making the choice of a successor a battleground that could shape the court's future for years.

Reagan's challenge to the Senate to begin confirmation hearings quickly was seen as an effort to correct what White House officials say privately was a tactical error in handling the Bork nomination — allowing opposition to develop in the weeks between the nomination and Senate hearings.

"It is up to all of us to see to it that Senate consideration of Judge Ginsburg's nomination is fair and dispassionate, and above all, prompt," Reagan said.

Ginsburg expressed deep appreciation to Reagan for "the confidence that you have placed in me." At the end of the ceremony in the East Room of the White House, he was joined on stage by his wife, Dr. Hallee Morgan, a gynecologist, and their daughter, a preschooler also named Hallee.

Ginsburg, a University of Chicago law school graduate, clerked for Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall before becoming a professor at Harvard Law School.

He joined the Reagan administration in 1983 as a deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's antitrust division, and then moved over to the Office of Management and Budget as administrator for information and regulatory affairs.

and is mostly concerned with winning."

Naster: Manhattan audience 'great'

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reporter

"Manhattan audiences are great, really great," said David Naster who appeared Thursday night at McCain Auditorium, along with Taylor Mason as members of the Coors Light Comedy Commandos.

"They (Manhattan audiences) relate to me and I relate to them very well," Naster said.

Naster and Mason are two of the eight members of the Coors Light Comedy Commandos. The Commandos travel throughout the school year visiting clubs and college campuses.

Taylor Mason opened the show to an audience of about 800, with renditions of The Flintstones theme song by The Who, Prince and Bruce Springsteen. He incorporated comedy, piano playing and ventriloquism into his act.

At one point Mason had the entire audience clapping along with a Fat Boys-type rap called "The Economical Boogie."

"If your teachers explained the economy this way maybe you'd be able to understand it," joked Mason.

Jake and Zood, two of Mason's puppets, also made brief appearances during the act.

As Mason left the stage, the audience gave him a standing ovation and remained standing to welcome the second comedian, David Naster.

"Sorry, I was kind of late getting here. I was at a sushi bar in Ogden that turned out to be a bait shop," said Naster as he opened his routine.

Twenty-three pounds lighter than he was on his last visit to Manhattan, and tooting the praises of Nutrisystem, Naster kept the comedy flowing at a fast rate.

"Yeah, I plan on getting back to my original weight, 6 pounds and 8 ounces," Naster joked.

Throughout his performance, Naster got the mostly college-aged audience involved in the comedy. Audience members would yell things to Naster and with quick wit, he would reply. At one point, many members of the audience took an active role in his routine of a man touring a pet shop, by making animal noises.

College audiences are fun, Naster said. Sometimes they are stupid. I mean they are young, conservative and afraid to laugh.

Naster has been traveling about two and a half weeks each month since he began touring with the Coors Light Comedy Commandos one year ago.

"I miss my family, but traveling with the Commandos is really fun because I am with people that I know," said Naster.

Both comedians combined their talents at the close of the show in an impromptu jam session.

see it amended into the Kerr-Rolfs plan, to avoid having to start the legislative process over.

Wagnon said she thinks most of the debate over the tax reform package will come when lawmakers consider how much of the windfall should be returned to taxpayers and how much, if any, should be spent by state agencies.

"I think it's an intrinsic part of every discussion," Wagnon said.

Hayden made a pledge during his successful 1986 gubernatorial campaign to get all of the windfall returned, but he has said the state's economic conditions have prevented him from making good on the promise immediately. Kerr said the task force could consider returning more of the windfall through changes in the state's corporate income taxes or other taxes.

However, Rolfs said he didn't see the windfall question as much of an obstacle to the plan's enactment.

"Anybody who's taken a close look at the state budget knows we're not out of the soup yet," Rolfs said.

Also, opposition to the plan is expected from groups who oppose changes in some of the itemized deductions.

"You could pick out any one deduction and get opposition," Kerr said. "In total, the package makes a lot of sense."

Baker said the demonstration is the opening of an education process for the public that will have to be an ongoing process.

Two placards being carried by protesters were inscribed with the words "Kill all that you can kill, Join the CIA" and "The CIA, it's not a job, it's a massacre," spin-offs of U.S. Army recruiting slogans.

"We are not saying the Army is criminal," said Denise Grimm, senior in economics and member of SISCA. "We just wanted to use catchy slogans."

Kelly Amerine, senior in history who interviewed with the CIA, said about 20 students participated in interviews with the agency.

"The CIA is a necessary part of the government," Amerine said.

He said his session with the CIA was more of an information briefing than a job interview, and the actual hiring process is six to nine months long.

"The CIA is only as good as the people in it. Right now there is a changing of the guard within the CIA which will allow changes from within," Amerine said.

"Right now I am only learning about the CIA, which is only one of many options I am looking at," Amerine said.

Until now, beer this real came only from a keg.

Draft beer is as real as beer gets. Since it's not heat-pasteurized, heat can't change its rich, smooth, real taste.

Miller Genuine Draft is as real as that. It's not heat-pasteurized like most other beers in bottles and cans. Instead, it's cold-filtered so it's as rich and smooth as only real draft beer can be.

As real as it gets.

Quality of education discussed

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

Union-Program Council Issues and Ideas presented the student body presidential candidates in the Union Catskeller Sunday for a chance to express their views on various issues concerning students. Issues of the most concern were the need for funding of Farrell Library and the "Margin of Excellence" plan.

Each of the four candidates outlined his opinion to the 31 people in attendance in a 10-minute presentation, followed by a question-and-answer period.

"I am the write-in candidate," said Monte Couchman, sophomore in secondary education, who opened the forum. "Not having my name on the ballot will be a disadvantage, but I will overcome it."

Couchman spoke about increasing faculty pay at both the university and the high school level.

Troy Lubbers, junior in business administration, said it is crucial for the student body president to be active on the state level. Many student issues will be addressed by the State Legislature and Board of Regents during the coming year.

"We're all willing to help improve the quality of education," Lubbers said. "But there are severe access problems (with the Margin of Excellence plan)."

Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics said, "There is no big alumni support for the library. No one graduated from the library."

Muir, who is currently serving as student agricultural senator and student representative to Faculty Senate, said the library needs student support. He suggested the college councils develop fund-raising projects in an effort to help fund the library.

Jack Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, has been a campus tour guide and has helped with enrollment and recruitment.

"Recruitment is my middle name," Taylor said.

Taylor said he is concerned about the education students receive at K-State.

"I think each one (curriculum) should be checked every five years to keep them on the cutting edge," Taylor said.

Ethics officials question judge's past decision

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Douglas H. Ginsburg had almost $140,000 invested in a cable television corporation when he "personally handled" a Justice Department effort to have the high court extend First Amendment protection to cable operators.

An administration source close to Ginsburg said Sunday that Ginsburg did not raise the possibility of staying out of the case with Justice Department superiors or with agency ethics officers. He said Ginsburg discussed the situation with subordinates.

The Supreme Court, on June 2, 1986, adopted Ginsburg's arguments in a decision that will reduce government regulation of cable operators.

"It is a First Amendment rights case that had economic consequences to it," said a former federal ethics official familiar with the cable case but not with Ginsburg's role in it. "If I'm holding cable stock, that is a good thing for me."

Ginsburg, nominated by President Reagan to succeed retired Justice Lewis Powell on the court, apparently did not violate criminal conflict of interest laws because the company in which he invested was not a direct party to the case even though it could benefit from the ruling.

But ethics experts said Ginsburg's actions could be viewed as skirting a presidential executive order forbidding actions that create an appearance of a conflict of interest or of favoritism. Violation of that order carries administrative penalties, such as a letter of reprimand or suspension.

Ginsburg himself declined comment. But speaking on his behalf Sunday night, Justice Department spokesman Terry Eastland said Ginsburg "considered at the time the possibility of staying out of the...case."

"Mr. Ginsburg decided that he could properly participate because the case before the court did not involve the company in which he had a financial interest," Eastland said. "He also concluded that he was not disqualified because of his ownership of stock in a Canadian company, Rogers Communications, Inc. ... Mr. Ginsburg determined that the value of his holdings in Rogers would not be financially affected regardless of the outcome of the case."

A former head of the Justice Department's antitrust division and now a U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge, Ginsburg, 41, is little known to the public, and his professional performance is being scrutinized by the Senate Judiciary Committee in preparation for confirmation hearings.

Ginsburg was before the same committee a year ago, when nominated for the appeals court.

Names used in candidate's ad without permission

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

An advertisement for student body presidential candidate Pat Muir in Wednesday's Collegian listed the names of "just a few" supporters, but not all of the students listed knew their names would appear in the advertisement.

Muir, senior in agricultural economics and candidate for student body president, said he compiled the list of supporters by using a sign-up list at his kick-off party and from the orders placed for "Muir Staff" sweatshirts.

Mike Kadel, senior in agricultural economics and bakery science and management, found his name had appeared in the advertisement as a supporter.

"I wanted to remain neutral so I could stand back and look at all the candidates," Kadel said. "Pat must have assumed I was a supporter, but I wished to remain neutral."

Kadel said he didn't know his name would be in the recent advertisement.

"I don't appreciate it — a student body presidential candidate putting my name in it — without my permission," Kadel said.

Kadel stated he had a good working relationship with Muir in the past as members of Steven Johnson's cabinet, as student senators and in the College of Agriculture.

"Pat asked me if I would like a sweatshirt and I said, 'Sure,' but I planned to give it to a guy in my house who is supporting Muir," Kadel said. "It must have just been a misunderstanding."

"I talked to Mike (Kadel) Thursday night at the Ag Elections Forum and asked him who he was supporting," said Jill Conger, sophomore in agricultural journalism. "He said he was neutral."

Eirene Tatham, senior in construction science, also had her name in the advertisement.

"(Muir) never did ask, 'Can I put your name in my ad?'" Tatham said. She said she agreed to support Muir "a long time ago."

John Bullock, junior in social sciences, said, "I wasn't aware my name was in the advertisement." Bullock said Muir did not ask permission to use his name in the advertisement.

"Pat and I are in Blue Key together so I really don't have a problem with it," Bullock said.

Roberta Applegate, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said consent should be obtained from people before names are used in such forms of advertising.

"Using someone's name or likeness for personal gain or commercial purposes or for some advantage is called appropriation," Applegate said. "Kansas case law recognizes appropriation, and people can sue if their names are used without their permission."

Muir said attempts were made to contact all the people in the ad, "but 60 people is a lot."

"We tried to contact people who we thought might be sensitive, but we didn't get in touch with all of them," he said. "I took names off (the list) at the last minute of those people I thought might have problems."

Muir said if the Collegian is going to run political ads, it should make people aware of the law.

"There is no communication between the advertising department and the newsroom," Muir said. "I feel like I've been set up."

"Ignorance is no excuse," Applegate said. "(Muir) should have gotten the consent, but it sounds like he made an innocent mistake."

Applegate, who teaches The Law of Mass Communications, said the Collegian advertising department should inform people of the law to protect itself from potential law suits.

Judy Goetz, Collegian advertising manager, said Muir was upset with the Collegian for not telling him he needed consent.

"If I had time, I would have printed a retraction," Muir said. "I intend to let everyone know my side of the story. I intend to discredit (the Collegian's) source."

The Collegian did not reveal its source to Muir.

A similar problem arose in the 1981 elections when a newly elected student body president ran a thank you advertisement in the Collegian listing his "campaign coordinators."

Collegian receives national Pacemaker

By The Collegian Staff

ST. LOUIS — K-State's student newspaper, the Kansas State Collegian, was named one of the four best collegiate papers in the nation Sunday at the annual convention of the Associated Collegiate Press and College Media Advisers.

The national Pacemaker ranking is the second in four years for the Collegian, which was named one of three Midwest region Pacemakers announced Oct. 19. The Collegian competed against approximately 15 regional Pacemakers for the award.

Other national Pacemakers named Sunday are the Indiana Daily Student at the University of Indiana in Bloomington, the Daily Texan at the University of Texas-Austin and The Graphic at Pepperdine University in Malibu, Calif.

In addition, K-State's yearbook, the Royal Purple, received one of six national Pacemaker awards at the convention. The 1986 book, whose editor was Ronda Corle, had been named a national Pacemaker late last spring.

The Collegian award was based on the fall 1986 and spring 1987 semesters. Editors were Chris

Anti-porn campaign arouses talk

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The opening shots in a war against hardcore pornography — a $300,000 campaign including billboards, a newspaper insert and a TV program — have been fired in Kansas City by activists who say their target is dehumanizing and dangerous.

Their critics, however, say the group is using scare tactics and exaggerating the problem to arouse the public, and they raise the specter of censorship down the road.

The anti-porn drive was a test, organizers said. A national group may take the campaign throughout the country, depending on its evaluation of the Kansas City effort.

The campaign launched over the past month by the National Coalition Against Pornography and its local affiliate urged people to Stand Together Opposing Pornography, or STOP. It featured 80 billboards, a two-hour television program, direct mail pleas, a 12-page newspaper insert and a phone bank to take calls from financial contributors.

"If enough of us stand together, we can provide the support our public officials need to take on the pornographers and prosecute them for selling illegal materials," said one advertiser.

The last Sunday in September, thousands of petitions were circulated at churches asking public officials to enforce obscenity laws.

"It is designed to communicate with virtually every adult in the Kansas City area," said Chris Cooper, full-time director of the coalition's Kansas City branch.

He called the group's fund-raising efforts during the month-long campaign that ended Saturday "very successful."

Cooper said grass-roots support was one reason Kansas City was chosen for STOP's debut. He also said coalition officials believed a large amount of obscene material is distributed here, though he said the level may be typical for a city of a half-million people.

The leader of the national organization, Presbyterian minister Jerry Kirk of Cincinnati, said the Kansas City results will be evaluated before other cities attempt a similar effort to depict pornography as not just offensive, but dangerous.

But the campaign has drawn criticism for statements such as one that Kansas City faces an "epidemic" of pornography. An editorial in The Kansas City Times suggested that it was exploiting contributors by using scare tactics and advocating censorship.

"We were surprised, frankly, by the editorial because our position is clearly against censorship," Cooper said.

Rugby plans new monument

RUGBY, N.D. — City leaders are reviving plans for a new monument to mark Rugby's one claim to modest fame — its location at the geographical center of North America.

The privately owned cairn that sits in front of a restaurant won't suffice, they say. The North Dakota Centennial Commission agrees, backing their proposal for a new, more prominent marker.

But the business community's grandiose plans for a $1 million, 160-foot tower were scuttled, and some townspeople still scoff at the idea of building a new monument.

Visitors to Rugby, which took its name from an English town, find it impossible to overlook the community's status as the center of the continent, even though the actual site is 14 miles south of town at a government marker underneath a lake.

Reagans return from funeral

WASHINGTON — President Reagan and his wife Nancy returned to the White House on Sunday after attending memorial services in Arizona for the first lady's mother, Edith Luckett Davis.

The first couple, both dressed in black, smiled and waved in response to applause from a small crowd gathered at the south entrance. An aide carrying an orchid bouquet followed the president and Nancy Reagan into the residence.

Reagan also waved off a question about his Dec. 7 summit meeting with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

On Saturday, the president addressed about 220 mourners at St. Thomas the Apostle Roman Catholic Church in Phoenix, Ariz., eulogizing his mother-in-law as one who "gave wit and charm and kindness throughout all her life."

Davis, 91, died last Monday of a stroke as she slept.

'Rambo' has close call on set

ELAT, Israel — Sylvester Stallone had a close call on the set of "Rambo III" on Sunday when a helicopter buzzed him during a stunt and missed his head by a few inches.

"I suppose if it had gotten any lower I could have saved the cost of a haircut," Stallone was quoted as saying by production spokesman Tom Gray.

Stallone ducked just in time and escaped unharmed, Gray said.

Gray said the scene called for a French-made Puma helicopter to buzz Stallone as explosives went off and fire flared around the actor.

Gray said the helicopter was supposed to fly about six feet above Stallone's head. He said the pilot misjudged the distance because dust and flames shrouded the set.

The scene was filmed in this Red Sea resort 190 miles south of Jerusalem. Filming in Israel began in the summer and will wrap up by the end of November, Gray said. Additional scenes for the film, which is set in Afghanistan, will be shot in Thailand and Pakistan.

Man rams into Berlin barriers

BERLIN — An unidentified man rammed his car into barriers in East Berlin early Sunday after speeding through Checkpoint Charlie in West Berlin, police said.

The man — who had blood on his head from the crash — was taken from the eastern control checkpoint on a stretcher by East German border police, West Berlin police quoted observers as saying.

The man's motives were unknown.

Bomb scare evacuates Seaton

Seaton Hall was evacuated Friday afternoon after an anonymous caller told personnel in the College of Architecture a bomb was planted somewhere in the building.

Bill Jahnke, professor and assistant dean of architecture, said "someone called and said there was a bomb."

K-State police and personnel who work in Seaton evacuated the building around 2:35 p.m., after which the K-State police conducted a "walk-through search of the building," said Sgt. Rick Howard of the KSU Police Department.

Howard said the search revealed nothing and after a cautionary time lapse, people were allowed back into the building around 3:15 p.m.

Spock recovering from illness

BOSTON — Dr. Benjamin Spock, the 84-year-old pediatrician to the baby boom generation, was reported in good condition Sunday at New England Medical Center after fainting and taking a tumble on a marble floor.

"He's doing very, very well," said hospital spokeswoman Diane Millikan. Spock was undergoing tests, she said.

Spock's wife, Mary Morgan, said he fainted before falling Saturday in the lobby of the Copley Plaza Hotel, where he was staying.

"He lost consciousness for about 15 seconds. He hit the floor so hard, he made a noise," said Jim Carey, concierge at the hotel.

Spock, best known for his book "Baby and Child Care," first published in 1946, was in Boston for a speech he was to deliver Sunday before a meeting of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Emmy winners have son

LOS ANGELES — Rhea Perlman and husband Danny DeVito are parents for the third time, with a son for the Emmy-winning performers, a spokeswoman at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center said Sunday.

Jake Daniel Sebastian DeVito was born Friday and weighed seven pounds, 11 ounces, and mother and child were doing well, Paula Correia said. The couple also have two daughters, aged 2 and 4.

Perlman won three Emmys for her portrayal of sharp-tongued waitress Carla Tortelli in the NBC-TV comedy hit "Cheers."

Ag Fall Follies unite students, faculty

By The Collegian Staff

Breaking down the barriers which may exist between faculty and students in the College of Agriculture was the purpose of the third annual Ag Fall Follies held Sunday in the Brandeberry Indoor Complex, said Lyle Hammer, sophomore in animal science and co-coordinator of the event.

"There seems to be a barrier that exists between students and faculty," Hammer said. "We're trying to break down that barrier and build more of a working relationship."

Hammer said 32 teams participated in the events which included volleyball, a water balloon toss, wheelbarrow races, a cowboy boot kick and a faculty event.

In the faculty event, faculty members removed their shoes and were blindfolded. The students on the faculty member's team then shouted directions to the faculty members as they tried to find their shoes in a pile and put them on again.

For the cowboy boot kick, a team member put on a cowboy boot part way and then kicked it off. The distance the boot was kicked was then measured.

Communist Party leader resigns Younger Chinese officials left to carry on

By The Associated Press

BEIJING — Top leader Deng Xiaoping resigned in triumph Sunday from the Communist Party's governing body, leaving younger officials to carry on his drive to shake up the stagnant bureaucracy and replace dogma with production.

The 83-year-old Deng left, as he had promised, at the end of a party congress that affirmed his policies and forced into retirement all the leading conservatives who had sought to slow his reforms.

The congress appointed a younger, streamlined party Central Committee that is expected Monday to confirm Deng's protege, premier Zhao Ziyang, as party general secretary.

It also is expected to keep Deng on as head of the party's key Central Military Commission, from which he likely will exert considerable influence on party decisions. The congress amended the party constitution so Deng can remain on the commission even though he resigned from the Central Committee.

Foreign reporters allowed into the final 20 minutes of the eight-day 13th National Party Congress at the Great Hall of the People saw Deng watch serenely as nearly 2,000 delegates raised their hands in unanimous approval of a report that summarized and defended his reform policies.

Conspicuously absent from the dais was 82-year-old Chen Yun, a conservative economist and leading proponent of the central planning system Deng has begun to smash.

Reporters were not allowed to witness voting on the new 175-member Central Committee, from which nearly half of the outgoing committee's 209 members were dropped.

Five leading conservatives who wanted to brake Deng's reforms and curb the influence of Western liberal ideas will not return to the committee.

Observers believed one of Deng's key reasons for retiring was to pressure elderly conservatives to follow suit, clearing the way for younger technocrats to take control.

Party spokesman Zhu Muzhi said the average age of the new Central Committee was 55, compared with an average age of 59 for the outgoing committee elected in 1982.

Deng's supporters remained on the committee, including Hu Yaobang, who was ousted as party general secretary in January for failing to crack down on widespread student pro-democracy demonstrations.

Zhao was named acting party chief to replace Hu.

Pornography protest aimed at wrong people

The Oct. 26 protest by the Manhattan chapter of the National Federation for Decency against the local Holiday Inn & Holidome for providing its guests with the option of viewing R-rated films in their rooms was perhaps noble in intention but misguided in execution.

The group's president said NFD was protesting the "anti-woman" content of the films which promote the rape myth. Members had the opportunity to see a sample of the movies before beginning their once-a-month picket up and down the sidewalk on Richards Drive in front of the entrances to the hotel.

While these films, being shown by Holiday Inns throughout the country, may in fact be anti-woman they are no worse than many of the films a person may see through their local cable TV system or rent from their neighborhood video or convenience stores.

It is difficult to believe that a person who wanted to view such entertainment would pay the $51 cost of a single room at the hotel when they could see the same or worse movies for the approximately $7 cost of a VCR and tape rental.

Not to mention the fact that the cost per viewing of such a movie at the Holiday Inn is $5.99. A person could obtain virtually unlimited viewing pleasure for much less money.

Truly anti-woman pornography is that which depicts women as willing victims of sexual assault. It leads to a perception by a man that the only reason for a woman's existence is to satisfy his desires.

It can also teach women to perceive themselves as nothing more than a piece of property existing solely to please a man no matter how he may treat her. It denies a woman her right as a person to enjoy a life of her own choosing, free from the fear that another person will decide her fate.

There are providers of hard-core, anti-woman pornography in Manhattan. They are local convenience and book stores which sell pornographic magazines. And just down highway K-18 from the Holiday Inn there is a video rental store which specializes in truly hard-core pornography, some of which utilizes the rape myth showing women aroused and fulfilled only when dominated by a man.

The products provided by these businesses are clearly a threat to women and more deserving of protest.

End of era in Louisiana good for all of politics

An era ended in Louisiana and United States politics last week when Gov. Edwin Edwards conceded the governor's race after finishing second in a run-off.

Edwards conceded the race to Charles Roemer thereby ending a bid for an unprecedented fourth term as the state's chief executive. Roemer, a Republican, had been lagging in the polls until last week when he won most of the state's newspapers' endorsements and proved you can run a campaign without major support from political action committees.

Major support from major interests has long been a Louisiana tradition. In the Richard Daley era, Chicago voters were told to vote early and vote often. Louisiana usually had the best government money and influence can buy. This makes the difference between Chicago (and the rest of the country) and Louisiana, where this type of action goes on openly and oftentimes with the blessing of the electorate.

During the reign of Edwin Edwards, he was accused several times of influence peddling, racketeering and excessive gambling. Edwards was only indicted once for racketeering and he was acquitted in 1983 of those charges. The point is, during those times there was only the slightest grumbling from the electorate about his actions and usually his popularity soared — especially in the cajun country where he was raised.

Now it seems Louisiana politics has moved on into this part of the twentieth century and left behind the actions that made Edwards popular far too long. This is good for Louisiana and the country as a whole. Edwards and Huey P. Long, the state's grand patriarch and machine boss, gave credibility to dirty politics in this country by showing that people could get elected and enjoy the celebrity of government service.

Hopefully, this will mark a new age for politics in Louisiana and the United States.

Just a little tale complete with wicked administration

Friends, Kansans, future student government leaders, lend me your crossword puzzle pause, for I have a tale to tell.

Once upon a time, the well-meaning citizens of the Land of Sunflowers sent a real schmuck by the name of Mike Hayden to the governor's mansion. Said that pinnacle of Western Kansas intellectualism from on high: "Whuuut we wanna dooo is heh-yelp the few-ture of the Kaaaansas ee-con-oh-mee." Thus did Wise Mike reduce, among other things, the budget of the finest institution of higher education in the land (i.e., K-State).

Once upon about the same time, a new administration monster at said university was looking for ways to increase revenues, and its long and detailed search brought it to a heretofore unheard-of idea: "The students have lots of gold. I think I shall trick some out of them."

So in that cold, dark December of 1986, the nasty new administration monster covered itself up in a cloak of poverty and came begging to student leaders. "Oh, please, kind students, can you spare a meager Institutional Support Fee for a while? Wise Mike from on high is trying to '...heh-yelp the few-ture of the Kaaaansas ee-con-oh-mee' and has taken my money away."

"Gladly, kind administration friend," was the reply, "for you are new and we want you to know we like your style."

End of fairy tale. Beginning of reality. The Institutional Support Fee is a 3 percent tax on the gross sales and service revenue of "Auxiliary Enterprises," a lofty title encompassing the Union, Housing, Intercollegiate Athletics, the Kansas Artificial Breeding Unit, Parking Operations, Student Publications Inc. (including the Collegian) and Lafene Student Health Center. Every time you buy a coke in the Union, or a parking permit, or a bandage at Lafene, or pay your residence hall fees, 3 percent of the total goes to the administration — in the form of the Institutional Support Fee.

Commentary

DAN OWENS

Collegian Columnist

I lived in the residence halls last year. I paid $2,100 in hall fees, and $63 of that went into this fee. I bought my books in the Union. I spent $350 on books last year with $10.50 of that going into this fee. Add in what I spent on food in the Union, on a football/basketball ticket and at Lafene, I contributed around $100 to the Institutional Support Fee in one year.

One hundred thousand dollars. That's how much money K-State was short when the administration decided to establish the Institutional Support Fee. Last year this fee raised $269,961 by administration figures, so the shortfall has been made up, right? Right. So the fee will now go away, right?

Wrong. Oh sure, when it was established, student leaders were told the Institutional Support Fee was a "temporary fee." Let's be real, kids. Any bureaucracy that calls a fee which adds to its revenue "temporary" is probably using the adjective in the same sense that the sun's light is sustaining life on earth on a "temporary" basis.

This nefarious state of affairs came about in an equally wicked manner. A meeting was held before Christmas break last December, and our then Student Body President Steve Johnson was told the administration was thinking about the fee and would contact Johnson before administrators moved on it. During Christmas break, while Johnson was dexteriously maneuvering his way down a ski slope in Colorado, the honest administration instituted the fee.

Sally Traeger, who was then Chairwoman of Student Senate, was contacted by the administration to gauge student opinion of the fee, and she said she thought students wouldn't mind. By coincidence, Traeger now has a fine job in President Jon Wefald's home state of Minnesota. (To be fair to Traeger, however, it should be noted she was taken unaware by this proposal and later told the administration never to ask her again to speak for the entire student body).

The long and the short of it is, students got reamed, screwed, given one up the old Hershey highway. And every time you buy a book or a bandage or anything else on campus, you keep getting reamed.

I tried to get some of this fee used to pay for the renovation of Holton Hall. Not all of it, or even close to most of it, just 33 percent for 4 years. First I was told no money was available. Then I was told if my bill passed, the administration could accept it now, give everyone a nice political victory, and in three years when I was gone, the Institutional Support Fee could be raised to cover the Holton Hall increase. Nice people in our new administration.

What to do? You can start buying your books at Varney's, boycotting the Union food and move out of the residence halls. Nice thoughts, but the nasty administration monster would certainly come up with new ways to pilfer funds from us oh-so-affluent K-Staters.

About the only thing to be done is to be awake the next time something like this happens. When the new student senators arrive in the Big Eight room in a couple of weeks, they'll undoubtedly hear about what a really, really wonderful new administration we have, and how many really, really exciting things they're doing at K-State.

What they won't say is that it's really, really likely these exciting things will be funded by us students.

Oliver North aided by terrorist; ticket policy unfair to majority

Well, the midsemester doldrums have rolled past and after a two-week absence, I have finally gotten around to writing another column. I am excited to be experimenting with combining the two unrelated topics of international politics and collegiate athletics into one rambling discourse.

The first topic has to do with a Cuban named Luis Posada Carriles. If you paid close attention to the Iran-Contra hearings this summer, you might have heard his name mentioned as one of the people who helped carry out Lt. Col. Oliver North's Contra resupply operation. But you might have missed out on some of the history surrounding this man who worked for "Ollie the Patriot."

Posada is a Cuban in exile who had participated in the CIA's not-so-secret war of sabotage against Fidel Castro's Cuba. During the 1960s and '70s, many operatives took part in raids launched from South Florida which were to disrupt the Cuban economy by destroying sugar cane fields and refineries. Some of these plots also included the well-publicized schemes such as using mafia hit men to assassinate Castro and lacing some of his cigars with LSD. Needless to say, these plots failed and, if anything, only succeeded in consolidating Castro's power.

In 1976, Posada, along with Orlando Bosch Avilla, planted a bomb on a Cuban Airlines plane in Barbados, which killed 73 Cuban civilians. This act of terrorism, which seems to have been borrowed from other terrorist groups, received little publicity in the United States. Whether or not Posada and Bosch were working for the CIA at the time is something we may never know.

But something we do know is what became of Posada after the Barbados incident. He was convicted of the bombing and put in prison in Venezuela where he was kept until 1985. At that time, someone, possibly the CIA, arranged for his escape by paying off some prison guards who allowed Posada to walk away.

Posada then went directly to Ilopango Air Force base in El Salvador. There he worked for North in the air resupply operation for the Nicaraguan Contras. This is the same air base that Eugene Hasenfus flew out of before being shot down over Nicaragua with a plane full of weapons.

How can North condemn terrorists one day and hire one the next? It seems as though terrorism, as defined by people like North and President Reagan, happens only when someone attacks us or our allies, not vice versa. We hire men like Posada to handle the dirty work so we can make Nicaragua a "democracy" like El Salvador, where the last four directors of the human rights agency have been assassinated by U.S.-supported government death squads.

So much for politics. Let's get down to the nitty gritty world of collegiate athletics, or more to the point, how to get Wildcat basketball tickets without getting frostbite. It seems we are faced with somewhat of a dilemma concerning student season tickets. There have been a lot of questions and complaints about the costs, both financial and physical, of seeing the Wildcats play well.

One of the problems brought to my attention is the current system of ticket distribution. In order to get a good seat, or maybe any seat at all, you have to wait in line for a couple of weeks. This isn't so bad if you don't mind the cold and have a tent and a lot of spare time. But there are a lot of "Cat backers out there who don't have this luxury."

The current system favors large organized living groups like residence halls and greek houses. They can send a few people to buy tickets for the whole group and can take turns holding their place in line. On the other hand, the off-campus students, which make up a majority of the student body, are many times left out in the cold. It should not be a requirement that one must be part of an organized group in order to get basketball tickets. This situation could cause even more animosity between living groups than already exists. Maybe some sort of lottery system could be worked out to give everyone an equal chance.

I hope you all enjoyed the double feature. Maybe next week I'll try mixing Chinese economics with microbiology to see what grows and sells in the Far East.

Student Body President — Vote for 1

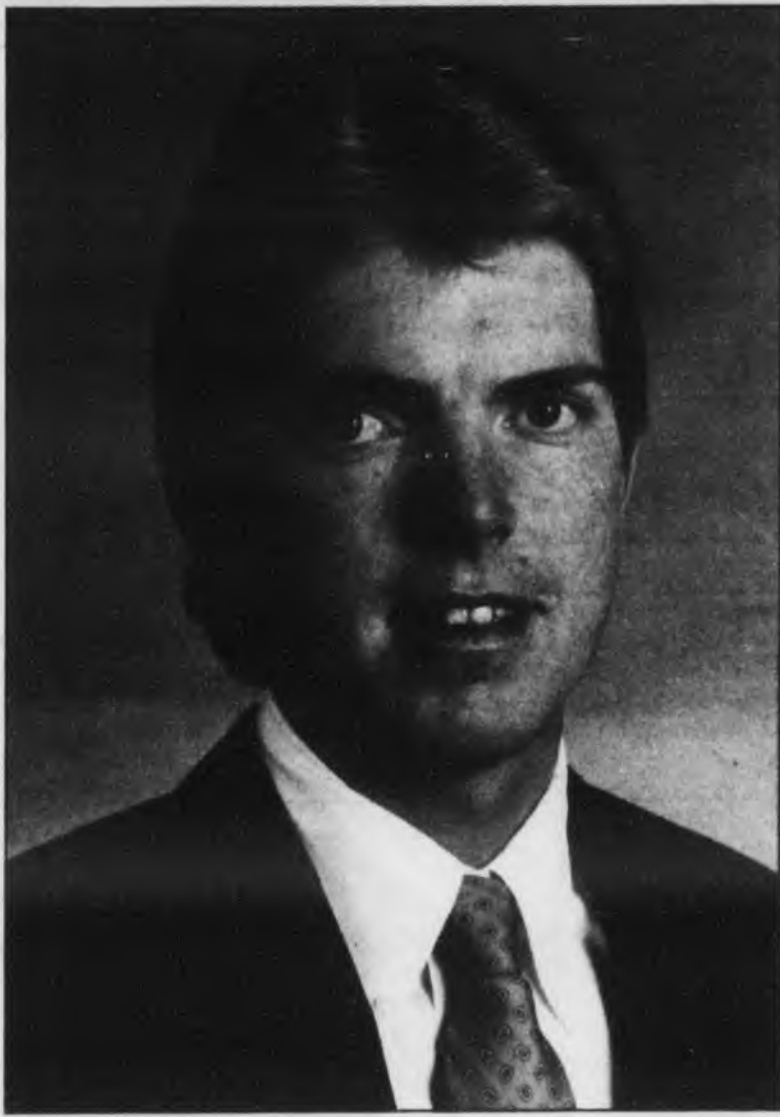

TROY LUBBERS, junior in marketing:

In a year that will be known as the "Year of Higher Education" in Kansas, we as students stand to gain a tremendous boost in the excellence of our University. But at what cost? In this crucial year for higher education, there are several issues that will directly affect students and the quality of education students receive.

One such issue is the Board of Regents' "Margin of Excellence" plan. It is a three-year funding plan designed to bring the state university budgets closer to the level of our peers. While this plan does improve the quality of our University, I feel it fails to adequately aid in student access.

Open admissions is another issue that directly affects students. Any policy change in admissions must be to improve all students' chances of success, not reduce student opportunity. The Regents' current proposal, I feel, is one of restrictions — not incentives.

For students to benefit from the outcome of these issues, they must voice their concerns and offer input to the Legislature, the governor and Board of Regents. The primary student voice, and the person in the best position to offer student input, is the student body president. As chairman of the Associated Students of Kansas, I have represented students' views at the state level for two years. I feel my lobbying experience and willingness to hear students' views will enable me to effectively convey student concerns as student body president.

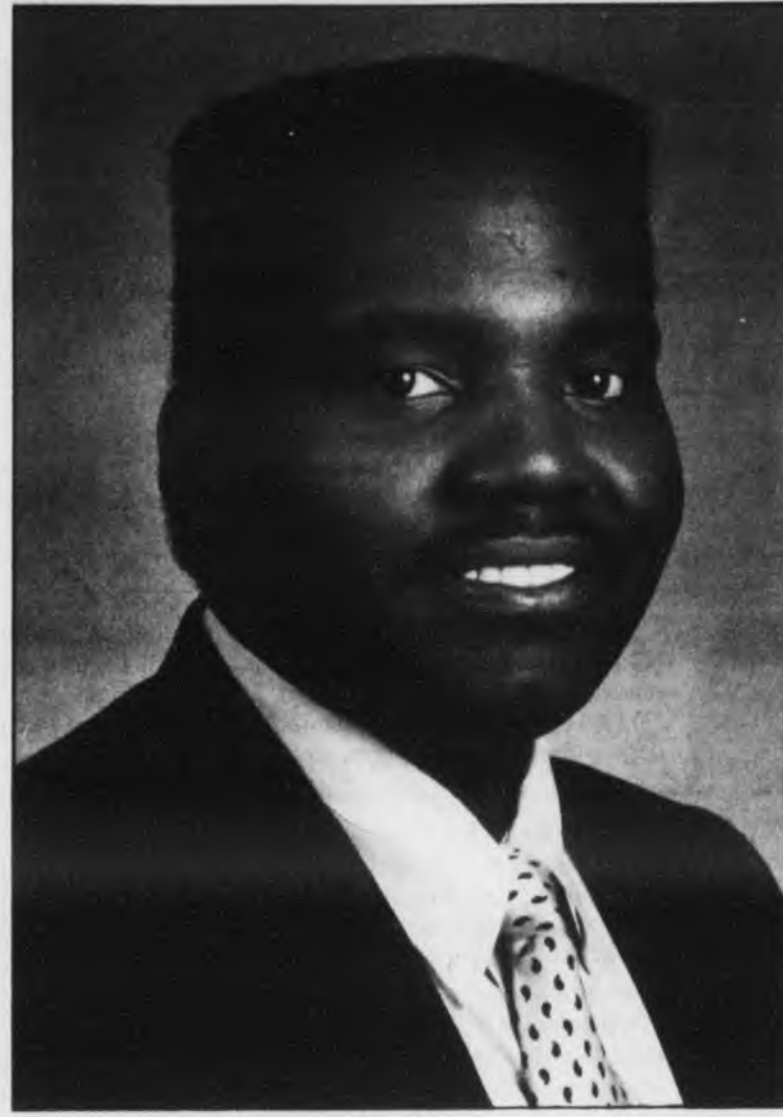

PAT MUIR, senior in agricultural economics:

The decisions made during the next year concerning K-State's future will have a lasting impact on this University. Education will be high on the state agenda this year, and our administration is moving very quickly to make up for lost ground. Both of these situations require experienced student leadership. K-State students have a right to be vocally represented after all we have done for this University.

During the last 18 months, I have been a student senator, the student representative to the Faculty Senate, and also served on the student body president's cabinet. These experiences have shown me the potential and limits of a student body president.

The most important role has to be providing the students' point of view to those asking for it. But in order to do that, the president must be visible and available to listen to students. If elected, I intend to make regular visits to clubs and living groups in order to be aware of what students are thinking.

Besides increasing student input, I would like to see Farrell Library become a priority of our administration. If K-State is to grow, the library must be dealt with for students using it today as well as those in the future. I would also like to see student government examine how much student fee money it is allocating to different groups. Students are not loaded checkbooks, and with increasing tuition, we must show some restraint.

JACK TAYLOR, junior in political science and life sciences:

The pride of being a K-Stater is an experience that cannot be replaced. It's the excitement we get from watching the 'Cats or by getting involved at KSU. This pride must be felt by everyone; but, when curriculums are deficient and parking is scarce, this pride can be lost.

If the curriculum could be evaluated, deficiencies can be found before too many students are affected. Since the funding to keep curriculum on the cutting edge is not there, we must look at what we have and work to improve it. The students of K-State deserve the best possible education and must be prepared for the 21st century.

The parking problem needs two solutions. The best long-term solution is a parking garage, which may not happen for five years. If a parking lot was built north of Weber Hall, some of the stress at the Cardwell and the Ackert-Durland lots would be alleviated.

Open admissions is a concern that every student should have. If K-State goes to selective admissions, classes below the 100 level could be cut, and those classes can be crucial for some students' survival.

For K-State to continue to prosper, pride must be the cornerstone. I would work to bring up the curriculums and see that students receive the best education possible. I believe something must be done to solve the parking problem. I am willing to do whatever I can. K-State needs a leader who will work for the students and make changes, not a manager who keeps us at the status quo.

Senate candidates were asked...

Please answer two of the following four questions; limit your answers to 25 words or less.

1. Why are you running for this position? What qualifications would you bring to the Senate?
2. Holton Hall: What are your thoughts/opinions/concerns on the decision to allocate $1.2 million in student fees for the renovation of this state building?
3. Selective Admissions: What are your thoughts/opinions/concerns about the proposal of the Kansas Board of Regents?
4. What legislative solutions would you propose as a senator to the problems at K-State?

In order to Vote...

Voting in the Student Governing Association general elections will take place Tuesday and Wednesday between 7:30 a.m. and 6:30 p.m. on the Statroom level of the K-State Union.

Students in veterinary medicine may vote at the Veterinary Medicine Complex from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m.

All students must present a validated K-State ID to vote.

College of Agriculture — Vote for 4

DON BAKER, sophomore in animal science and industry:

- (1) I have the enthusiasm and ability to serve the students in the College of Agriculture and carry on the great tradition of past ag senators.
- (2) Holton Hall needs renovation. I feel, under the circumstances, Senate took the best action. But in the future, student funds should never be committed to the renovation of state buildings.

JEFF CLARK, junior in bakery science and management:

- (1) Through my experiences on Ag Council and the Student Body President's Cabinet, I have gained effective leadership skills that would benefit agricultural student representation in Senate.
- (2) I oppose the selective admissions proposal before the Regents because it would cause enrollment to decline and limit Kansas high school graduates' opportunity to further their education.

MARK DAVIS, sophomore in agricultural economics:

- (3) Kansas State University was formed as a land grant college and funded by Kansas taxes. For this reason, K-State should be open to all Kansans — not just the academic elite.
- (4) The parking has been a problem at K-State since before the 1940s. There have been many surveys and proposals. It's time to elect someone who will get something done.

RANDALL DAVIS, sophomore in agronomy:

- (2) Student money is just that — student money. Before allocation of your money is made, you should be consulted, and your voice spoken on the floor of the University Senate.
- (3) Selective admissions is the wrong choice for K-State. I believe decreased enrollment would result in lower funds and quality while increasing tuition for current students.

TODD JOHNSON, sophomore in agronomy:

- (1) The College of Agriculture must be well represented. I believe my involvement as Ag College Delegate, Ag Ambassador and Agronomy Club member will enable me to meet that requirement.
- (4) If elected to Student Senate, I would propose the placing of a crosswalk located northwest of Ahearn Field House across Denison Avenue and an increased funding of college student councils.

ANDREA KRUG, junior in agricultural economics and accounting:

- (1) Having been a Student Senate intern, I have developed an interest in student government. I have become familiar with current issues and would like to use this experience in Senate.
- (2) Holton Hall needs renovation. I feel, under the circumstances, Senate took the best action. But in the future, student funds should never be committed to the renovation of state buildings.

LORI NOVAK, junior in animal sciences and industry:

- (1) My candidacy is an effort to strengthen awareness between the College of Agriculture, living groups and student government. Communication and feedback are imperative to Senate's success.
- (4) As a student, I could propose numerous solutions to problems at K-State. As a student senator, I would propose those solutions supported most widely by the student body I represent.

DAVID OSWALT, junior in agricultural economics:

- (1) I view being a senator as a chance to make a difference. After serving on Ag Council and chairing Ag Ambassadors, I feel qualified to represent the College of Agriculture.
- (3) I feel the idea is good, but it is unfeasible. I believe selective admissions would ultimately bring lower enrollment to our University just as we're starting to correct this problem.

JESSICA TAJCHMAN, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine:

- (2) If the state rents Holton Hall from the University, renovation is the administration's expense. If the state owned Holton, it would be the state's expense. The students don't own Holton.
- (3) Selective admissions would affect motivated students who don't meet the requirements, and our state would be impacted by a deficit of college graduates.

DAVID WHETSTONE, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine:

- (3) The Board of Regents proposal was weak. I believe selective admissions should be researched, but I don't want to see K-State become a dumping site for KU rejects.
- (4) Using money gained through "Margin of Excellence," I would like to improve Farrell Library and address other student needs. Students should receive benefits from a program they will pay for.

College of Arts and Sciences — Vote for 13

 WENDY ALBRECHT, sophomore in psychology: (1) As a Senate Intern, I was informed about campus issues. Working on the Academic Affairs Committee increased my concern for improving advisers, teacher evaluations and the Library. (3) Though secondary education may need improvement, this could hurt K-State. The ACT test is a poor determinant of college success. Everyone needs an equal opportunity to better themselves.	JEFF MARTIN, sophomore in anthropology: Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.
DOUG BOUDREAU, freshman in journalism and mass communications: Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.	 JAMES McATEE, junior in pre-medicine: (1) I have leadership qualities to offer to student government. Because many people I have associated with are involved in student government, I have a greater insight to its workings. (3) Selective admissions should be studied more closely because of its positive and negative aspects. My membership on Arts and Science Council will allow me to study it in more detail.
 DAVID BROOKS, sophomore in history: (1) I'm running for Student Senate so I can have my say in student government. My experience in residence hall Judicial Board will help me in the position of student senator. (2) The money to renovate Holton Hall should come from the students who use the building and the State. This fair compromise would ease both parties' financial burdens.	 JASON R. MILES, sophomore in political science: (1) Having served on the president's cabinet, H.E.R.O. steering committee and U-Learn task force, I have the experience to make a positive and productive contribution to Senate. (3) Selective admissions should be limited to require only completion of specific courses in high school. We should not base admission on one Saturday's test score or on high school GPA.
 ROBERT L. BROWN, freshman in political science: (1) I am running for Student Senate because I want to become more involved in student government. Also, I would like to see the residence halls become active participants of the Senate. (4) In the next year, "Margin of Excellence," selective admissions and the combining of comprehensive services offered by Lafene and Holton Hall will be major concerns of the Senate.	 CHARLENE NICHOLS, junior in journalism and mass communications: (1) As chairwoman of Senate Communications Committee and member of the Executive Committee, I have gained the experience to fairly represent students in Senate and to the administration. (3) I oppose the Board of Regents' proposal and believe it is vital for students to formulate a counter proposal through the Associated Students of Kansas.
 MITCH BRUNING, sophomore in pre-dentistry: (2) I feel the decision to renovate Holton Hall, a state building, with student money was a mistake. The State should have financed the renovation, and student money could be used elsewhere. (3) I think selective admissions is not in Kansas State's best interest. We need to get enough students coming to K-State before we start doing any restricting.	 JENNY RESCHKE, sophomore in journalism and mass communications and pre-law: (1) Through my involvement in campus organizations, I have developed a feeling of responsibility toward K-State, and I feel that as a senator I would contribute to K-State's continued progress. (3) Because Kansas taxpayers support our state universities, I feel that it would be inappropriate to deny admission to any Kansas student, especially under the proposed criteria.
 CAROLYN CAWLEY, junior in journalism and mass communications and French: (2) I support Senate's decision on Holton Hall because $640 has already been collected for its renovation. However, in the future, I would not support student monies funding state buildings. (3) I am opposed to a closed admissions policy because I feel that every student with a high school degree deserves the opportunity to attend a land grant university.	AUSTIN RICHARDSON, freshman in pre-law: (1) The Senate needs complete representation. As a senator, I would do everything in my power to see that everyone is represented alike — equal representation for residence halls and Greeks. (2) The Holton Hall issue is one that the Senate should consider seriously. My feelings are that the Senate should renovate the hall as much as possible. No Porsches.
ERIC CUSTER, sophomore in political science: (2) A precedent of paying for state buildings was set when student fees went toward the Coliseum and Holton Hall. We need to stop this trend and make the State pay. (3) We need to upgrade our admissions standards to maintain credibility if KU goes selective. I am not in favor of really stringent qualifications. Students wanting to learn should be admitted.	 CINDY RIEMANN, freshman in biochemistry: (2) The students should have been allowed to vote on such an expensive and controversial project as Holton Hall. In the future, students should be consulted before action is taken. (4) I want to see more communication between student government and living groups, such as residence halls. The Senate can only make informed decisions if students are informed.
 BRENNAN DELL, sophomore in advertising: (1) I've been a Senate Intern for the past term and followed proceedings diligently. I'm well aware of current issues, confident of my experience and excited to be a part of Senate. (3) I'm very much in favor of an enhanced admissions policy. I believe, however, that the current proposal should be further researched as to the long-term effects to the University.	 GRANT SHELLENBERGER, freshman in economics: (1) I feel I can effectively represent the ideas and concerns of the students of the College of Arts and Sciences and of Kansas State University. (3) In regard to selective admissions, an admissions policy should provide incentives — not restrictions. The Regents' proposal does not encourage student access, but rather limits it.
 LAURA EWY, sophomore in speech pathology and audiology: (3) Universities should have high standards for entrance, but some high schools don't offer the needed requirements. Our universities must educate where previous exposure is lacking. (4) K-State should advertise its strengths, not only to high school students but also to K-State students. Campus awareness could help our entire student body recruit incoming freshmen.	 DOUG WASHINGTON, sophomore in pre-law: (1) In the past, I have had the opportunity to become familiar with several facets of government here at K-State. I feel these experiences would greatly benefit me as a senator. (3) K-State is a land grant university that has demonstrated academic excellence. Changing the admissions policy may have an adverse effect on that tradition.
 CHRISTY GARDNER, sophomore in journalism and mass communications: (1) I'm very eager to learn more about the issues here at KSU. As a senator, I'd be willing to give my time and energy to benefit the University. (3) A program for admissions should hold provisions for those students who wish to attend KSU but don't fulfill the requirements. These students could be accepted under some form of probation.	 MARIEKE WOLFE, sophomore in pre-medicine: (2) I would like to see a mandatory student referendum not only for the Holton Hall proposal, but for any student fee allocation of more than $1 million. (3) Instead of selective admissions, I would support a probation period for students not meeting academic standards. This gives everyone a chance — while still remaining selective.

College of Education — Vote for 3

 FERN GRANT, junior in psychology: (1) I'm running because I want to learn about K-State. I feel the student government is the heart of our institution. I have honest opinions about issues — which I consider my qualification. (3) I have negative opinions concerning the Regents' proposal on selective admissions. I don't feel a certain exam score should determine the future of a student's selection of college.	 MELISSA BLUMEL, sophomore in English and secondary education: (1) My candidacy stems from a desire to participate in decisions affecting the student body. This, coupled with my enthusiasm and background, makes me a viable candidate for Student Senate. (3) Selective admissions focuses on students' previous records instead of their future possibilities. Keeping open admissions is maintaining the opportunity for all to aspire academically at KSU.
 LAURIE LAWSON, sophomore in radio-television: (1) I want to represent the students by getting involved in the decision-making process affecting the University. My previous leadership experiences more than qualify me for this position. (3) I am in favor of enhancing the existing admissions policies at K-State, but it is my concern that more research should be done on the current Board of Regents' proposal.	 BRENDA HALINSKI, junior in elementary education: (1) I have attended other universities and have seen various ways problems have been approached. I believe I can bring new ideas and suggested alternatives to this campus. (3) I am concerned because not all high schoolers have decided whether or not to attend college before they graduate, and their GPA may not have been a high priority.
 NORBERT MAREK, sophomore in history and pre-law: (1) I'm running because I'm interested in doing more for K-State. I want to work hard for students and try to address their needs. (2) I support the Senate's decision on Holton Hall. Students in the past have supported building projects, when needed, and may need to in the future.	LYLE TUCK, sophomore in secondary education: Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

College of Architecture and Design — Vote for 3

 DOUG HELLER, junior in architecture: (1) As a highly reputable college, architecture and design deserves an active voice, which I would provide, aided by my work on SGA committees and college organizations. (3) Selective admissions would inevitably hinder potential students with its more stringent standard. The proposal is feasible, but the requirements must be reworked.
DANIEL HERR, junior in architecture: (1) I am running for student senator in hopes of receiving more allocations for the College of Architecture. I feel the college's facilities should reflect its high academic standards. (3) Selective admissions presents major disadvantages: decreased enrollment of incoming students, and current students would be inconvenienced by the deletion of certain courses.
 CHRIS KERN, junior in landscape architecture: (2) Renovation of Holton has to be done, and I support that. I do not and cannot support the method by which this bill was passed. (3) K-State's enrollment figures are up, and restrictions might bring those figures back down. I feel we should continue building those numbers yet maintain the high quality of the past.
MARY K. LANE, junior in architecture: (1) Many architecture students feel isolated from the rest of campus. I would like to play the role of liaison and keep Seaton dwellers informed. (2) I would have to support Senate's decision to renovate Holton because funds have been collected from students. In the future, I would not support student funding for a state building.

Presidents give alternative to selective admissions

By Candise Leonard
Government Editor

The seven student body presidents from the Regents institutions have proposed an alternative to the selective admissions proposal currently being studied by the Board.

Kent Bradley, senior in nutrition science and student body president, said open admissions is still the law in Kansas.

"Any changes must be passed by the State Legislature," Bradley said. "Since they are not expected to formally adopt something until December, there's still ample time to write (the Regents)."

Bradley encouraged concerned individuals to "be very vocal with their hometown legislator" about the plan drafted by the Regents' staff.

The recommendation of the Student Advisory Committee does not include a minimum American Collegiate Testing score for college admission. The plan requires one of the following for entering freshmen:

- Complete the Regents' preparatory curriculum (except the foreign language requirement) with a minimum grade point average of 2.0.
- If you're deficient in foreign language, you can take it at the university level," Bradley said, for those high schools not offering foreign language.
- Earn a minimum 2.0 GPA in nine hours of prescribed summer session college-level courses before the fall semester.
- "This allows you to catch up for having below a 2.0 or not having completed the Regents' curriculum," Bradley said. "Then you'd be admitted to the university of your choice."
- Earn a passing grade in make-up courses for the specific subjects missed in the Regents' curriculum.

The SAC proposal also makes special concession for applicants 21 years of age or older, saying admissions should remain open for them.

"We're saying that we realize with the age crisis there are individuals in the workforce who want to become re-educated or further their career," Bradley said. "They're not going to be punished for that. This says experience is worth something."

The recommendation also outlines a window of no more than 10 percent for exceptions to the policy. Each university may determine how it defines its "exceptions."

"It could be used for athletes or someone with a special skill such as dramatics, literature or music," Bradley said, because these students may have concentrated during high school and not completed the Regents' prescribed curriculum.

The Regents are expected to develop an opinion by December, in time for the legislative session in January. Many other groups, such as the provosts and various faculty senates, have formulated guidelines in addition to the SAC recommendation.

"It could be a bargaining chip (for the 'Margin of Excellence' plan)," Bradley said. "But there were three bills last year, so this debate over selective admissions was conceived before the Margin of Excellence."

VOTE Tuesday and Wednesday

College of Business Administration — Vote for 8

ANDREW B. APPLETON, sophomore in accounting:
(1) Activity in Student Affairs and Social Services Committee, along with knowledge gained through the Senate Internship, has given me the skills to represent K-State students.
(2) The allocation of student fees to a state-funded building is wrong. The allocation was necessary to do it right because of a previous obligation by the 1982-1983 Senate.

RON BETHEL, senior in marketing:
(1) After attending K-State for three years, I feel that I have a good insight of what is going on as far as campus issues and student government.
(3) I feel that selective admissions is something we need to examine thoroughly before any irrational decisions are made. If not, this policy would propose more thrust than opportunity.

CRAIG CORCINI, sophomore in marketing:
Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

SCOTT DARGER, junior in marketing:
(2) I think the renovation of Holton Hall is necessary, but the $1.2 million should not come solely from students — some of the funds could come from the State.
(3) Selective admissions is a good idea because it can raise the quality of students at K-State. However, the program is not necessary until enrollment is at full capacity.

JOE GITTEMEIER, sophomore in marketing and accounting:
Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

MARY GLEISSNER, sophomore in marketing:
(1) With my campus involvement, experience, my enthusiasm and pride in K-State, I would give time and dedication to keep the University at its high standards.
(3) I oppose selective admissions for K-State because I feel the goal of our high-quality university should be not only to accept the best students, but to make the best students.

JOE KARLIN, junior in accounting and finance:
(1) As senator, I would devote time and effort to the concerns of students, and I would represent them and try to achieve the goals of the Senate.
(3) The open admissions policy presently in effect must not be altered. The right to attain a quality education is a right which should not be denied to anyone.

PATRICK KELLERMAN, junior in finance:
(1) I am running for this position because I am concerned about students. I believe my experience as president of my living group can aid the decision-making of Student Senate.
(3) K-State has long been admired for its open admissions policy. Selective admissions will close the door of opportunity for those who fall short of the qualifications.

JULI KRAMER, junior in accounting:
(1) I've seen K-State go from low enrollment to the upswing of this year. My experience can help Senate look at the past and go forward with new ideas.
(3) I'm for selective admissions because it will let Regents schools concentrate their resources, and all students can do better whether it be at a University, Juco or Vo-tech.

KRISTY LINE, junior in finance:
(1) Having lived in two different campus-organized housing facilities and being a former student athlete, I have heard many points of view, and my input would be fair and unbiased.
(2) I am discouraged that student monies are being used to fund a state building. Nevertheless, past senators made a commitment, and the present Senate made the best decision.

DENNIS MARSTALL, freshman in business administration:
(2) I am against spending student fees for the renovation of Holton Hall and any other state building. The $1.2 million should be used to upgrade the business program.
(3) I am against selective admissions because it will hamper many people from getting a quality education from KSU if they do not meet the requirements.

Student senators must devote time

By Jill Conger
Collegian Reporter

The people chosen to represent the students in their college to Student Senate will soon find being a senator involves a commitment of time.

"It seems people encourage students to run for Senate just because it looks good on the resume, but Student Senate is a busy group with a lot of responsibilities," said Michelle Benoit, Senate chairwoman and a senior in agricultural economics.

Student senators are elected by colleges and the number is allocated on the basis of enrollment.

"The duties of the senators entail much more than just attending the Student Senate meetings every Thursday night at 7 in the Union Big Eight Room," Benoit said. "Senators also have to serve one office hour per week and work on one of the six standing committees throughout the year."

Benoit explained the office hour gives each senator the chance to do research for a bill or answer questions about a proposed bill from people who walk in or call on the Student Governing Association Hotline.

Senators can express a preference of standing committees to serve on during their term. The committees generally meet once a week.

"The duty of the senators is to work with the committee and relate any proposals or suggestions that the committee has back to Senate,"

Benoit said.

The term for elected senators begins Nov. 19, but the elected senators need to start attending Senate meeting Nov. 5.

Senate meetings are led by the chairperson, whom the new senators will elect at the Dec. 3 meeting. In order to be elected to the Senate chair position, Benoit said, candidates have to be nominated by a student senator.

"Overall, Student Senate is a busy group of people," Benoit said. "I think that it is really important for the newly elected senators to take what they were elected to do seriously, and realize it is not just going to a meeting every Thursday — but it is a commitment of time."

Student government offers many positions for students

By The Collegian Staff

Student government offers many activities for K-Staters wanting to get involved in something other than being a member of Student Senate.

"The first of January, the Collegian runs advertisements for students who want to apply to get involved and participate on a Senate standing committee or as a Senate intern," said Michelle Benoit, Student Senate chairwoman and senior in agricultural economics.

Senate operates with six standing committees, each composed of about 15 students. The committees include Finance, Communications, Student Affairs and Social Services, Legislative Affairs, Academic and University Affairs, and Senate Operations. In order to serve on a committee, students must apply through the Student Governing Association office.

"We try to select students who will provide a wide representation of the student body at K-State," Benoit said.

Serving on a special task force is another means of involvement in student government.

"Whenever the need for a task force arises, Student Senate runs an advertisement in the Collegian," said Kent Bradley, student body president and senior in nutrition science.

Interested students can apply, and selections are made after interviews with the student body president, personnel selections coordinator and the Student Senate chairperson.

"We usually select people on the basis of living group representation or whatever characteristics the task force calls for," Bradley said.

Another avenue of participation is with the Student Senate Intern program.

Serving on the cabinet of the student body president is another option for involvement.

"The student body president appoints his or her cabinet, and the positions are open for anyone who wants to apply," Bradley said. "Applications for cabinet positions can be picked up in the Student Governing office after the elections next week."

MONTY McCLAIN, sophomore in finance:
(1) I believe my current position on Senate Finance Committee has given me valuable insight on the proper workings of the allocation process and experience before the Senate.
(3) Though I am in favor of improving our educational programs, I do not feel selective admissions is the answer here in a state university.

DIANE MUIR, junior in management and marketing:
(1) I am articulate, perceptive and have established working relationships with administrators and faculty. I will represent students to sustain a better business college.
(2) I think it's fantastic if students can fund renovations of campus buildings, but let's not lose sight of the true source of wealth — our faculty and staff.

LAUREN O'CONNOR, sophomore in accounting and finance:
(1) I see Student Senate as an integral part of K-State, and through my involvement in various campus organizations, I feel my qualifications are a definite asset.
(3) The proposal needs to be considered carefully as it could have extreme effects on all Kansas universities. K-State needs students but not at the cost of its educational reputation.

ROB PATTERSON, freshman in business administration:
(3) Selective admissions does not suit KSU. This is the first year that enrollment has increased, so there should be little need to restrict the number of new entrants.
(4) I propose we provide better counseling for freshmen, so classes suit them better, and we besiege the State for improved housing and classroom facilities.

E.J. SCHWARTZ, freshman in business management:
(2) Holton Hall and any other buildings on campus must be maintained. However, students should not be forced to take the burden of paying for a state building.
(3) Universities in Kansas are for the people of the state, and we should maintain open admissions. The proposal is against all my beliefs about a land grant university.

TIM SIEBES, freshman in business administration:
Did not turn in form.

JACK STOERMAN, freshman in finance:
(1) K-State student government is a challenge — one which I intend to conquer. Challenges are overcome through teamwork. As a team member, I will be honest, ambitious and open-minded.
(3) K-State was established as a public learning institution. By limiting the number of students who may attend, we would deprive many citizens the chance at a college education.

SCOTT STUDLEY, sophomore in finance:
(1) Before K-State, I had eight years of experience working with budgets and planning committees. Since that is Student Senate's work load, this experience is invaluable.
(3) The open admissions policy should remain in effect. It is the responsibility of the institution to retain individuals based on their performance at the institution.

MARK THOMPSON, sophomore in marketing:
Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

MICHAEL J. TOEDMAN, sophomore in business administration:
(1) As chairman of the Senate Interns last year, I have learned many of the proceedings of Student Senate and how it is operated.
(3) I feel keeping students who don't do well on standardized tests from attending state universities is unfair to both the students and to society.

RUSSELL WILSON, senior in marketing:
(1) I'm running for Senate because I could bring new ideas that reflect what students want — not what senators think they "should" want.
(4) As a senator I would propose solutions to the parking problem, selective admissions and the issue of fluency exams for graduate teaching assistants.

College of Human Ecology — Vote for 3

SUSAN ALTON, junior in human ecology and mass communications:
(2) I agree with Senate's decision to follow through with funding the renovation of Holton Hall. I believe that all student services should be kept under one roof.
(3) My concern with selective admissions is the proposal for admittance to be based on ACT scores. The aim should be to better prepare students for college, not turn them away.

MARY JO LAMPE, junior in human ecology:
(2) Senate did right for the students by deciding to renovate Holton Hall for the full amount. The commitment had been made. However, students shouldn't fund any more state buildings.
(3) I think that admissions policies should be enhanced. However, I don't agree with the current Regents' proposal because there should be more research into the effect of the action.

SALLY MEADOWS, sophomore in interior design:
(1) I decided to run for Student Senate because of my concerns about students and their opinions. With my enthusiasm and interest, I can voice your concerns.
(3) The proposal of selective admissions would make K-State less accessible to students who are thinking about college and could deny them the chance to achieve their goal of higher education.

MARYA VIBERT, freshman in apparel and textile marketing:
(1) I've been involved as a representative and class secretary. I enjoy being at the heart of student decisions that will affect my peers. Increasing student awareness is high on my list.
(2) Originally, Holton Hall's renovation shouldn't have been taken on by the students. As it stands, I agree with the $1.2 million allocated for renovation. I want to prevent it next time.

JULIE WISE, junior in hotel and restaurant management:
(2) I am in favor of student fees renovating Holton Hall because it houses student services and, therefore, cannot be renovated by the State as an academic building.
(3) Selective admissions should not be used at this university. K-State needs to first accomplish increased admissions before concerning themselves with selective admissions.

'Open-minded, average' thinker to run for student body position

By The Collegian Staff

Monte Couchman, sophomore in secondary education, announced his campaign for student body president as a write-in candidate Friday. Couchman said he decided to run as a write-in after he and a group of friends discussed the election and determined they could not support any of the announced candidates. "I very much want to do this, I wouldn't be spending the time, money and effort if I wasn't a serious candidate," he said.

Couchman said it is more important to elect a candidate who will be open-minded about the issues rather than a candidate with a plan about current issues.

He said he is open-minded and considers himself fortunate that he has not been "indoctrinated into the processes of student government."

"My thinking is along (the lines of) the average student," he said.

Lack of student participation in student government is one of Couchman's concerns. He also wants to increase student input about all the issues and convey it to the administration.

"The job of student body president is going out and speaking and getting one-on-one contact with living groups," he said.

College of Engineering — Vote for 8

HOLLY BELL, freshman in chemical engineering:
Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

VINCENT MORRIS, sophomore in electrical engineering:
(1) I am running for a Senate position to become involved in SGA. I am currently a hall governing board member, but I feel that I need to broaden my leadership skills even more.
(4) Two problems I would like to address in the near future are the parking problems and the process of acquiring basketball tickets by organizations.

JOHNNY GAFFNEY, freshman in industrial engineering:
(1) Through the experience of leadership in numerous clubs and organizations, I've gained responsibility and the power of voice and would utilize them to accomplish goals for my constituents.
(3) A standardized test used for admissions at K-State would defeat its greatness by eliminating the ingredient that accounts for its success — the varying abilities and talents of its students.

FILZA HASSAN, junior in architectural engineering:
(1) Through my involvement in campus organizations, I've seen Senate's active role in campus issues and decisions. As senator, I'll represent students — their ideas, concerns and opinions.
(3) I see no need for implementing selective admissions. Our responsibility as a state institution is to educate the entire community. We cannot limit students. Instead, we should encourage them.

GEORGE HESS, junior in mechanical engineering:
(1) As a junior, I have seen many problems dealt with and solved by Student Senate. I would bring new ideas using hindsight from these past solutions.
(3) This proposal would hinder our forward progress as a university. A drop in enrollment would result in a drop in tuition revenues which may affect programs funded by these monies.

KEVIN HOCHMAN, senior in electrical engineering:
(1) I want to be a voice for the average student on campus. I think bills passed in Senate should reflect concerns of the students, not the concerns of individual senators.
(3) This proposal would unfairly punish the prospective student for being the victim of a poor high school education. Everyone should be given the opportunity to at least try!

PAUL JACKSON, sophomore in architectural engineering:
Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

KELLY KIRK, sophomore in mechanical engineering:
(1) I decided to run for Student Senate for three reasons: to learn more about University operations, to meet new friends and to try to bring my fellow students' thoughts and ideas out in the open.
(2) In my opinion, the money allocated from student fees for the renovation of Holton Hall sets a dangerous precedent. I believe that state-funded buildings should be just that — state funded.

JAMES LEBAK, senior in electrical engineering and mathematics:
(1) From my experience on the SGA's Representation Ad Hoc Committee, I decided to run to help implement the committee's goals of broader input and communication in Student Senate.
(2) Student funds should not renovate state buildings again. However, I support Senate's decision to renovate Holton properly since student funds had been committed in this case.

JOHN MCINTYRE, junior in industrial engineering:
(1) Running for Student Senate is my way of showing concern for what is happening at K-State. I would like to contribute to the University, and this is an ideal opportunity.
(3) Though raising the admission standards would reduce the number of remedial courses that need would be offered, I feel this budget-reducing trade-off would prejudice the rural student.

WILLIAM MOCK, junior in electrical engineering:
(1) As a student senator, I could be more involved on campus while representing the College of Engineering. I would bring previous experience with student government to the position.
(4) I would like to see higher standards of spoken English for all instructors. Student Senate should pressure the University administration to take action on this issue.

BILL NELSON, freshman in electrical engineering:
Did not turn in form.

BARRY PETERSON, senior in electrical engineering:
Did not turn in form.

MARK REAMS, junior in electrical engineering:
(2) I support the decision allocating $1.2 million for the Holton Hall renovation. However, this decision sets a precedent, and we should not let student funding of state buildings go unchecked.
(3) Selective admissions is too restrictive. Kansans shouldn't be denied an education based on performance in high school. Increased funding improves education more than selective admissions.

LISA REPHLO, junior in mechanical engineering:
(1) As a junior in the mainstream of engineering, I will base my decisions on the opinions I hear from my fellow engineering students, rather than only my personal opinions.
(3) Universities should be known for the quality of their graduating students, not those entering. Selective admissions would deny students the right to prove themselves at our state universities.

MIKE VALENTINE, sophomore in industrial engineering:
(2) The decision to renovate Holton Hall for $1.2 million is a step in the right direction because it will be upgraded as it should be — not by yearly spending to keep it "acceptable."
(3) I don't agree with selective admissions as it is because K-State's enrollment would be cut, and the only over-populated campus in Kansas is the University of Kansas.

GREG WEISENBORN, junior in electrical engineering:
(3) Selective admissions will only be effective if it provides adequately stringent requirements which are agreeable to all Regents schools, and not destroy our existing quality programs.
(4) I will continue to be aware of the concerns and needs of all students. Most legislation will focus on student involvement, and the students need to have their opinions voiced.

MIKE WOOTTON, junior in industrial engineering:
(1) I am adept at expressing my opinions. I also communicate frequently with a large number of engineers. As a senator, I will express your views as strongly as need be.
(3) Selective admissions attacks the symptoms, not the disease. More structured college-prep programs in high school will solve our problems and eliminate fewer potential students.

VAN ZANDER, freshman in electrical engineering:
Name removed from official ballot because candidate failed to turn in required expenditure report.

Graduate School — Vote for 6

JUSTIN M. SANDERS, graduate in physics:
(1) I am running for student senator to present a graduate student perspective on campus issues. I have the experience of two previous terms as senator.
(2) The Senate must carefully oversee the renovation project to ensure that the money is spent efficiently to provide the best facility for the dollar.

College of Veterinary Medicine — Vote for 1

Board of Student Publications — Vote for 4

PAUL BRANSON, junior in journalism and mass communications:
The basic responsibility of the Board of Student Publications is to direct the Collegian and the Royal Purple in such a way so the present high standards may be maintained.
As a journalism and mass communications student, I am concerned about the upkeep of these high standards since they are a reflection of the entire department. I think the Collegian can only help the JMC department regain its accreditation.
I have been active in the publication of an award-winning newspaper for the past five years. This experience will be valuable as a member of the Board. I also see my involvement in Haymaker Hall HGB is an indicator of my dedication to K-State.

SUSAN HILT, freshman in journalism and mass communications:
Student Publications Inc. produces two publications which are nationally recognized for their excellence. I believe it is vitally important for the quality to remain high so students get the best news available.
As a major in journalism and mass communications and staff member of the Royal Purple, I know firsthand the amount of time and dedication the staffs give for the continuance of excellence.
It is vital that the students' opinions are heard and expressed in these publications. If elected, I would have an open mind to ways of improving Student Publications Inc. to maintain its level of excellence.

BRIAN HOWELL, senior in journalism and mass communications:
Every day as you look around campus, you see student publications. Students reading Collegians, Royal Purple photographers taking candid photos and reporters interviewing students on campus.
As a senior in advertising and public relations, I see the importance these publications have on campus and realize the concern of maintaining the excellence of the Royal Purple and the Collegian.
As a community college transfer student, I have been involved in many editorial positions and feel this experience could bring new and creative ideas to the department.
My insight on editing, photography and advertising would help in choosing future staffs and keep our tradition of awards.

GARY LYTLE, junior in journalism and mass communications:
Yes, that's my picture and I want your vote. Why? Because I'm qualified — like everyone who's running.
This is my third year in Student Publications as a photographer, and I'm the photo editor for the Royal Purple. More importantly, I have a deep interest in what happens to Student Publications. Working for the newspaper and yearbook is just as important as the academic part of college.
The Collegian and Royal Purple are among the best college publications in the nation. The Board contributes to that success by making needed changes. My interest in journalism, knowledge of trends in the field and experience with the operations of Student Publications make me a good choice.

ALICIA LOWE, freshman in journalism and mass communications:
Student Publications is a corporation touching each student at K-State, whether through the Collegian or Royal Purple. Both publications are among the best produced by colleges and universities in the nation.
As a member of the Board of Student Publications, I would maintain this quality and strive to improve upon it. My aim is to be open to suggestions from students and bring them to the Board.
As a freshman in journalism and mass communications, I have a background in both newspapers and magazines from high school. I am currently employed as housing and index editor for the Royal Purple. I feel these qualifications enable me to make sound decisions on behalf of the students.

MINDY ROBERT, junior in journalism and mass communications:
K-State students are fortunate to have publications that accurately report the happenings on and around campus — both the good and the bad. The Collegian and Royal Purple have both received national recognition. I am proud of this tradition, and we should not take it for granted.
Each area of Student Publications must continue to strive for improvement. I have worked for the Collegian advertising staff and the Royal Purple staff, and I know the dedication it takes to produce these quality publications.
As a Board member, I would listen to how the students think Student Publications can improve. Because without the support of the students, the tradition of excellence will be lost.

JEFF SCHRAG, junior in journalism and mass communications:
The K-State Collegian and Royal Purple have never been better! Both publications serve as leaders and pacesetters in the collegiate journalism world. If you have ever looked at KU's yearbook or read other Big Eight newspapers, you know what I mean.
This level of excellence needs to be maintained and expanded upon. Thus, members on the Board must not only be responsive to the student body who elected them but also to the future of journalism.
I am a journalism major. Thus, with my education and past experiences in student government added to my association with the Collegian, I am confident that I could play a significant role in shaping an even brighter future for K-State publications.

Lady harriers run to third-place finish

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

NORMAN, Okla. — The K-State women's cross country team didn't do as well as expected Saturday at the Big Eight Conference championships. The Wildcats, picked to finish in the top two, came in a close third behind Colorado and Nebraska.

"To be honest, I'm a little disappointed," K-State Coach John Capriotti said. "At the beginning of the year, this is where I thought we'd finish, but as the year went on I thought we'd be a little higher.

"I thought all of our girls competed well. They just didn't have a good day," he added. "In order to win, we needed to have a good day."

Pacing K-State's women was Laura Haggerty whose 17:55 clocking in the 5,000-meter race was good enough for eighth place.

"I was hoping to do a lot better," Haggerty said. "I really should have been a lot further up (in the pack). A lot of us were upset with the way we ran today. It wasn't a better day for us."

Alysun Deckert finished 11th in 18:05, Jenny Faunce was 16th in 18:24, Anne Stadler finished 17th in 18:25, Becky Ives was 18th in 18:26, Marge Eddy finished 21st in 18:36 and Renee Russell was 44th in 20:09.

"We were in the race for most of the time," Capriotti said. "We kind of fell off maybe the last three quarters of a mile. Up until two miles, the race was pretty even between us, Colorado and Nebraska."

On a warm day that saw wind gusts up to 30 mph and several run-

K-State men, KU tie for fourth; Keller 10th in championships

NORMAN, Okla. — The K-State men's cross country team had one of its better outings Saturday, capturing a tie for fourth place in the Big Eight Conference championships.

Iowa State captured the men's division followed closely by Nebraska, and Colorado took third. K-State and Kansas tied for fourth.

"Our men actually had a great day tying for fourth," K-State Coach John Capriotti said. "I was really happy with that. After redshirting five guys and losing our other top runner, David Warders, we didn't

David Keller was the top finisher among the K-State men, finishing 10th in 32:50. Phil Byrne finished 12th in 32:58, Daryl Reichard was 20th in 33:33, Joe Bonneau was 34th in 35:00 and Steve Christensen finished 39th in 35:28.

As in the earlier women's competition, heavy winds and warmer temperatures had an adverse affect on some of the runners, but it didn't seem to bother K-State's team. Keller said he thought the conditions were ideal.

"Every now and then I was out alone against the wind but everybody had to run against the wind," Keller said. "I run best under warmer conditions. Coach told us to get a lot of water because a lot of girls got dehydrated, so I was sure to do that."

"My body felt good today. I wanted to get in the top 20. I would have been happy with that. I didn't have any trouble at all (with the weather)," he added.

"We had three guys run great races," Capriotti said. "Keller is a sophomore finishing 10th, Byrne is a freshman and he finished 12th and Reichard, a walk-on, finishing 20th in a great conference."

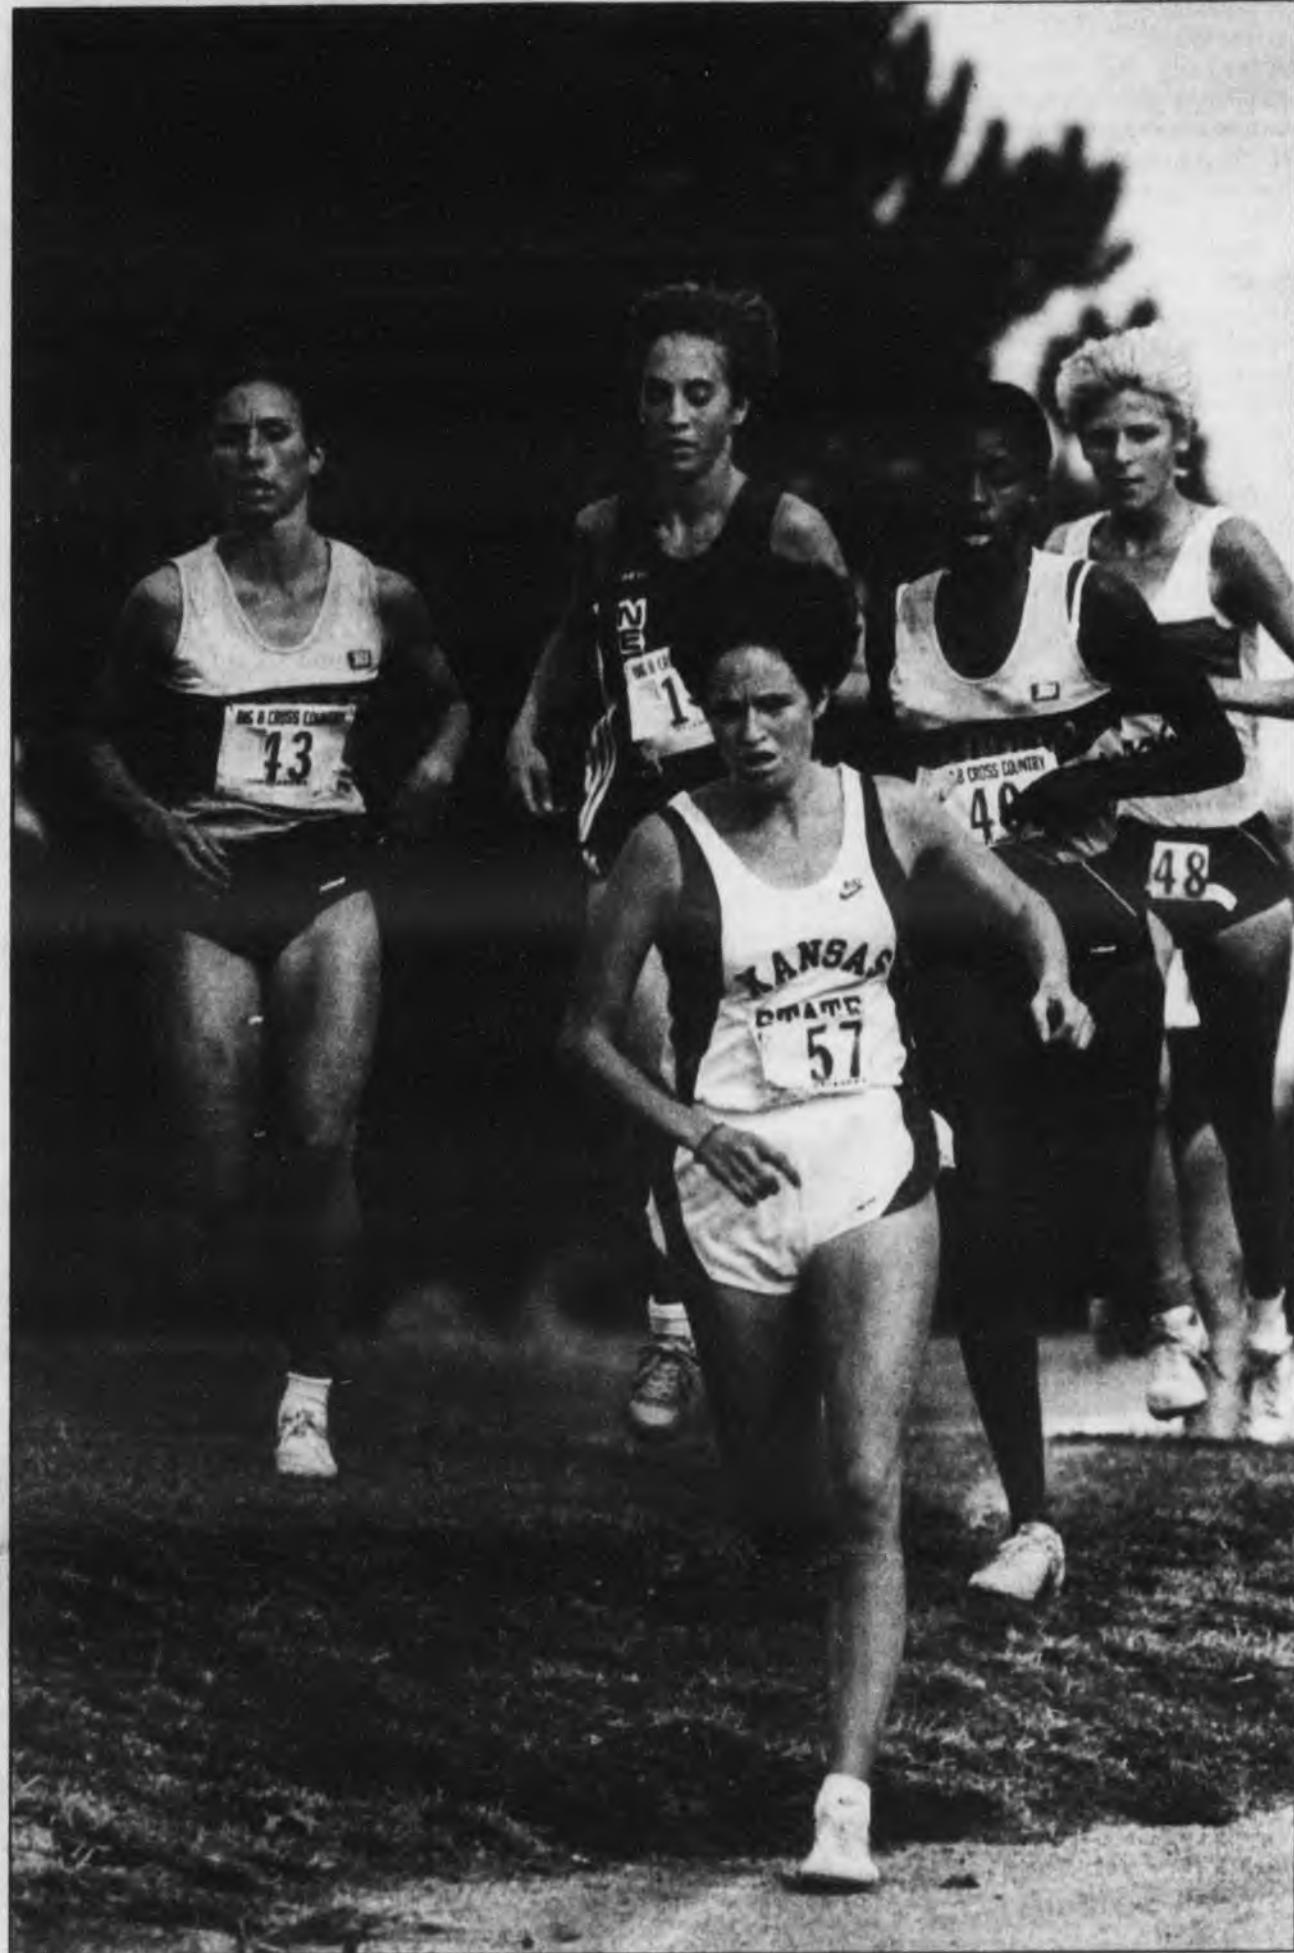

"Those guys did a hell of a job, and that was the surprise of the day. Bon-

Tip-Off Classic raises $500-$600 for KSU Student Foundation, ICAT

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

Reader's Digest basketball — you know, the condensed version — was played Saturday in the west gym of Ahearn Field House.

The KSU Student Foundation and the "I Contributed A Twenty Club" hosted the Wildcat Tip-Off Classic, a three-on-three basketball tournament, which attracted 21 men's and five women's teams.

Murray Head, assistant director of the foundation, said approximately $500 to $600 was raised for the two organizations which plan on making the tournament an annual event.

"I think we can possibly double (the turnout) or even go better next year," Head said. "We just have to make it more visible to the University. It's a fun event for everybody."

Corporate sponsors donated prizes to the top four finishers in each division and provided T-shirts for each participant.

In the men's division, the Lucky Cue sailed through the winner's bracket undefeated and downed the Double Stuff, 15-9, in the finals.

Sam Haney, junior in business administration-pre-professional, was a member of the winning squad. He said the competition was surprising.

"Yeah, I wasn't expecting it to be as tough as it was," said Haney, who led the Lucky Cues with seven baskets. Haney is a veteran of intense competition, though, having played basketball at Hutchinson Community College with Sean Alvarado, now with the University of Kansas, and Todd Christian, a standout guard with Oklahoma State University.

Other members of the men's champions were: Brent Bahner, senior in finance; Jed McKee, graduate in grain science; and Kevin Willt, senior in mechanical engineering.

Double Stuff team member Lynn Smith, former Wildcat point guard and now a graduate assistant under Coach Lon Kruger, was also impressed by the competition.

"I never experienced nothing like it," Smith said.

Because the Double Stuff had to fight their way through the loser's bracket, they ended up playing four consecutive games to reach the title match. Needless to say, Smith was visibly tired.

"It ain't like playing conference ball, Smith said. "You can kind of lay off (when you get to rest on the bench)."

In the women's division the Hooplas, coached by former Lady Cat Carlisa Thomas, fought their way through the loser's bracket and downed the Watermelon Shots twice in the finals to take the title.

Indiana no longer a one-sport state

The little birdie failed to make its weekly trip to my ear this week, so this column is likely to be a tad bit like a car spinning out of control at Indy — all over the road.

■ Speaking of Indianapolis, how about that toddlin' little town in the state that's gone football crazy? Eric Dickerson, late of the Los Angeles Rams (a.k.a. spendthrifts), is the newest arrival in town via a blockbuster, three-team trade last Friday, and his arrival might be just in time to spark the Colts to a playoff berth.

Following Indianapolis' win over the New York Jets Sunday, the Colts found themselves in a first-place tie in the American Football Conference's Eastern Division with New England. That's right, sports fans, the Colts are in first place and it's November.

Dickerson might not have the blockers as a Colt that he did as a Ram, but his mere presence adds balance to an attack that has been built primarily around the pass. If any one player can make an immediate impact on a team and change its fortunes, it's a good bet Dickerson is that player.

■ On the downside of things in what is known as basketball heaven (and was, until recently, known as football hell), the Indiana Hoosier football team lost to Iowa this past weekend, making the Big Ten's "Run for the Roses" an even bigger mess than it had been to this point.

Several teams still have a mathematical shot at making the trip to Pasadena, Calif., on New Year's Day, including Indiana and Michigan State, who have yet to meet. That showdown should determine who makes the trip to lose to U.C.L.A.

The Bruins have it on cruise control now, having blasted Arizona State Saturday on the road. U.C.L.A.'s only loss came against Nebraska, and the Bruins, led by quarterback Troy Aikman and running back Gaston Green, appear ready to feast on any team the Big Ten sends in their direction.

■ The countdown is on: 19 days to "Game of the Century III!" The Oklahoma-Nebraska contest on Nov. 21 promises to be the best football game this year, but Nebraska quarterback Steve Taylor has other ideas.

It seems Taylor, fresh off his team's pounding of Missouri Saturday, brashly predicted that the matchup with Oklahoma wouldn't be close. Nebraska, he 'Cats receive no treats from Cowboys

Frustrating day for 0-8 Wildcats

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

STILLWATER, Okla. — K-State's football team was haunted on Halloween night, but not by ghosts and goblins and things that go bump in the night.

Instead, the Wildcats were haunted by poltergeists in the form of turnovers on four of their first five possessions enroute to a 56-7 defeat Saturday at the hands of Oklahoma State.

K-State's first turnover was a costly one indeed. With OSU having scored on its first possession, the 'Cats were driving deep into Cowboy territory when Rod Smith picked off a Gary Swim pass and scampered 76 yards for a touchdown to put OSU ahead by 14.

The Wildcats went on to surrender the ball on their next three possessions, and by the time K-State could regroup, OSU had taken the miscues and turned them into a 28-0 lead with 30 seconds to play in the first quarter.

"It doesn't get much worse than we played tonight," K-State Coach Stan Parrish said. "I don't know whether (OSU) played good, but we played very poorly in all phases. You can't turn the ball over that much to them and expect to win. We just didn't do much right."

K-State turned the ball over six times as compared to OSU's two. K-State had five passes intercepted and fumbled once while the Cowboys threw only one interception and fumbled once.

The 'Cats finally got on the board with 8:27 remaining in the second quarter when Tom Dillon made a two-yard plunge for the lone K-State score. Dillon set up the score by racing for 23 yards on a first and 20 situation to keep the drive alive.

Oklahoma State scored a touchdown on its next possession and the Cowboys also scored on their first two possessions of the second half to squelch any hopes of a K-State comeback.

Frustration seemed to be the key to the Wildcat loss. Linebacker Matt Wallerstedt, K-State's defensive leader, was ejected early in the second quarter for fighting.

"These kids are very, very frustrated. It's not easy to go through what we've been through," Parrish said. "We haven't been in a game in a long time. We came apart at the seams."

"It doesn't get much worse than we played tonight."

—Stan Parrish

There weren't many bright spots for the 'Cats in the game, but the play of Dillon, a sophomore walk-on running back, caught more than one spectator's eye. The Manhattan native carried the ball nine times for 44 yards and a touchdown, and had five kickoff returns for an average of 25.6 yards per return.

Offensively for the Cowboys, it was the same old story. Running back Thurman Thomas rushed for 130 yards, Hart Lee Dykes had six receptions for 81 yards and quarterback Mike Gundy was 13 for 19 passing for 157 yards and a touchdown.

With his first reception of the game, Dykes tied the record for all-time receptions at OSU which was 120. With four games left to play in his junior season, Dykes has 125 receptions.

on 17 carries. It was the first time since OSU played Arizona State University in 1984 that two Cowboy running backs have rushed for more than 100 yards in one game.

"(Thomas and Sanders) are both real good and they're real quick," Parrish said. "Both of them can take you the whole way. Put them together with their receivers and their quarterback and they are a very explosive football team."

K-State's defense had a tough time trying to contain OSU's potent offense. The Cowboys racked up 321 yards on the ground and 193 through the air.

"Offensively, they were never able to stop us," OSU Coach Pat Jones said. "I was a little bit afraid that we'd be a bit drained (emotionally) coming in off the Missouri game."

The loss drops K-State to 0-4 in the Big Eight Conference and 0-8 overall. Oklahoma State ran its record to 3-1 in the conference and 7-1 overall.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

After tripping over defensive back Brad Lambert, K-State's Rod Johnson tumbles into Oklahoma State's Thurman Thomas after he gained 38 yards. Thomas' drive set up OSU's sixth touchdown.

Wildcats scrimmage at Hutch

Seven players scored in double figures during the K-State men's basketball scrimmage played Friday night at the Hutchinson Sports Arena.

Mitch Richmond, who hit on his first six shots, scored 22 points to lead the Purple team to a 83-48 win.

"I thought we accomplished what we had hoped to," Coach Lon Kruger said. "We wanted to set up several game-type situations and I thought we did rather well. Our shooting was very good, especially early, and that was nice to see."

Also scoring in double figures for the Purple team were Steve Henson with 13, Ron Meyer had 12 and Charles Bledsoe added 11. Fred McCoy paced the White squad with 13, Mark Dobbins chipped in 12 points and Carlos Diggins had 11. Will Scott is sidelined for two to three weeks with a broken foot bone and didn't play.

Volleyball team wins tourney

K-State's volleyball team rolled to the championship Friday and Saturday in The Wichita State University Invitational.

The Wildcats whipped the host Shockers Friday night 15-7, 8-15, 15-11 and 15-7 and defeated Tulsa on Saturday 15-7, 16-14 and 15-4. K-State also won by forfeit over the University of Missouri-Kansas City. UMKC came into the tournament with a minimum of six players and one was injured in an earlier match with WSU.

"After our loss at Oklahoma...we needed some confidence building," Coach Scott Nelson said. "We executed pretty well, and will have to continue to do that as we get ready to wrap up the conference schedule."

K-State, 17-7 overall, will host seventh-ranked Nebraska at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in Ahearn Field House.

Tennis team whips WSU, Tulsa

The K-State women's tennis team posted identical 8-1 victories over Tulsa and Wichita State Saturday and Sunday in Wichita.

In Saturday's match, K-State got off to a good start by winning all of its matches except for the No. 1 singles match.

Sunday's action was a repeat of Saturday's performance with the only K-State loss coming at the No. 1 singles position.

For the weekend K-State played a total of eight, three-set matches, compiling a perfect 8-0 record in extra-set matches.

ners dehydrate, K-State's women didn't seem to have a problem with the heat.

"I didn't feel any warmth at all," Haggerty said. "I really didn't think it was any warmer than normal."

The overall women's champion was Jackie Goodman of Oklahoma State University who finished in 16:57.84.

With two weeks remaining until the district meet in Columbia, Mo., K-State's women are now gunning to finish as one of the top two teams at the meet and advance to the National Collegiate Athletic Association championships.

"We finished third in a tough conference, but we can run better," Capriotti said. "We're going to have to run better in a couple of weeks at the district meet if we're going to go to nationals because they only take two teams."

"It's not over yet. We're going to regroup these next two weeks and, hopefully, if we get in all of our conditioning, we'll have a good shot (at the top two spots)."

"In two weeks we can do a lot," Haggerty added. "Every day makes a difference in the racing. We could easily be back."

neau and Christensen, our other two guys, ran tough too. They kept us in there."

With a team consisting mainly of underclassmen, Capriotti is extremely optimistic about the future of men's cross country at K-State.

"I'm really excited about the men because we have five more guys who weren't in there that we redshirted," Capriotti said. "This conference is going to be a great conference. We have Nebraska ranked sixth and Iowa State ranked eighth right now."

"It's a tough conference and I thought the men had a heck of a day, and I'm very excited with their finish. The men did a great job. They just had a better day than the women did."

Capriotti had entered the men's meet hoping his team would finish in the top three, though he admitted his team would have had to run harder than ever to do so.

The domination by the Cyclones wasn't unexpected, as Capriotti had predicted they would be the team to beat prior to the race.

The individual men's champion was Barnaba Korir of Iowa State who posted a 31:59.51 over the 8,000-meter course.

Entrepreneurial incubator to help town

By Brett Hacker
Collegian Reporter

To help develop small businesses, a study will be conducted to determine the feasibility of an entrepreneurial incubator in the Manhattan area.

The $48,000 study will look into four areas and will take eight months to complete, said Donald Rathbone, professor and dean of engineering.

The study will:
■ determine the feasibility of such an institute,
■ cite the funding needs and the Fledgling businesses would benefit funding sources available to support such an enterprise,

■ explore possible site locations for the incubator,
■ and develop a list of potential tenants for the facility.

"The purpose (of the incubator) is to give a young entrepreneur — or even not so young entrepreneur — an environment where they can develop their ideas and their products at very low cost," Rathbone said.

The center will help entrepreneurs develop an idea or start a company. "The big problem today is that it's expensive sometimes to get started. When you take and start in your garage, you're working in a vacuum. You don't have anybody to interact with," Rathbone said.

It will also help the entrepreneurs develop a business plan, and provide secretarial support and computer help, he said.

Starting new businesses for local development will benefit the entire Manhattan area, Rathbone said.

Development of the concept began in 1984, but he said he was unsure of the Kansas Legislature's support of such a project at that time.

"Well, today I think we have a much better climate with the State of Kansas. They have passed laws, changed their constitution even, so they could get into economic development in a more effective manner," Rathbone said.

Another plus for the project, he said, is the local support for the idea. "The city and county in this area have always been very pro-economic development," Rathbone said.

Whether or not the incubator will be a profit or a non-profit center will be determined in the study. It will also recommend if it should be a public or private institution.

"We're trying to make it easy for (entrepreneurs) to be successful," Rathbone said.

As far as building needs, Rathbone said a 10,000-square-foot building would provide the minimum amount of space. It would be divided among 10 entrepreneurs.

John Walters, a K-State graduate, was chosen to do the study and ultimately oversee the operation. He currently is a senior vice president of sales for a French company's branch office on the East Coast.

"Most studies of any size would Wichita airplane workers approve three-year contract

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Members of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers at Gates Learjet Corp. have approved a three-year contract calling for general wage increases in 1988 and 1989.

The new contract, which covers more than 800 workers at the company's Wichita facilities, contains a 3 percent lump sum bonus in the first year, a 3 percent general wage increase in the second year and a 2 percent general wage increase in the third year.

The contract also increases retirement benefits by 20 percent beginning Jan. 1, 1988.

On the final day of bargaining Friday, Gates Learjet negotiators agreed to withdraw a proposal that would have kept the plant operating 24 hours a day, seven days a week, union officials said.

Babbitt, son safe after wreck

By The Associated Press

PHOENIX, Ariz. — Democratic presidential hopeful Bruce Babbitt and his son escaped serious injury but their car was destroyed when a motorist rear-ended the auto and it hit a car in front.

Babbitt, 49, suffered possible whiplash, said campaign spokesman Vada Manager. No one else in Saturday's three-car accident reported any injuries.

The former Arizona governor and his son Christopher, 12, were heading to play basketball at a hotel health club when a van with rain-soaked brakes collided with the rear of Babbitt's 1977 Buick LeSabre, Manager said.

Babbitt's car then hit a vehicle in front of it that contained an acquaintance, Phil Weeks, who also was going to the health club, Manager said.

Babbitt, a lawyer himself, called the "best lawyer in Phoenix," his wife, Hattie, after the accident, Manager said.

Both Babbitt and his son were wearing seatbelts, the spokesman said.

Babbitt has had back problems before but is an outdoors enthusiast who has taken long bicycling, hiking and cross-country ski trips.

The former governor made several television and photo appearances later in the day and then boarded a flight for New Hampshire, Manager said.

"He was feeling fine," the spokesman said, adding that Babbitt would probably use a heating pad while in New Hampshire and would consult a doctor if necessary.

Babbitt said he was stopped for a red light when the mini-van driven by Donna Mae Lampinen, who had just dropped off a group of Boy Scouts, slid into the back of his car, Manager said.

Center opens to aid rural Kansas

By Jackie Brazzle
Collegian Reporter

Economically and socially troubled rural Kansas communities will be getting extra aid in the form of the newly established Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives.

The center, located in the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work, is organized under the University provost and has linkages with other colleges and extension agencies on campus, said Jan Flora, acting center director.

Flora said the center is a research and policies organization set up to better understand rural situations and to propose alternatives to those situations. He said the center will be looking at a variety of needs within rural Kansas communities. The center will look at the potential growth centers (communities) and compare them to communities which are not growth centers.

Provost James Coffman said KCRI will serve as a resource through which University expertise can be directed to study the educational, social and economic problems and opportunities in rural development.

The center will also offer practical solutions to rural problems, said President Jon Wefald.

"The Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives will focus the strengths of the many existing services of this state's land grant university and will generate practical solutions to overcome the roadblocks to rural development," Wefald said.

Flora said that the center was set up at K-state because of the initiative of people involved.

"I think that K-State has something special to bring to the organization. We are the only organization based within a university that has rural community development as our primary mission," Flora said.

He said there is a strong need for a basic data base of community needs and that K-State will facilitate these data bases.

"This will enable K-State to better help the communities," Flora said.

He said a goal the center is trying to accomplish is the economic development of rural communities beyond the industrialism aspect.

"We want to give them the opportunities and the tools to compete for informational resources," Flora said. "We are going to try to look at how rural communities would best fit into an economic development scheme and how that scheme can be modified to fit that community."

Flora said the option of living in a small community and doing it so the quality of life is not cut back has become difficult. Correcting the quality of life is going to require a larger access to informational resources and interest on the part of the communities to work together to use these resources, he said.

Another problem rural communities have is monetary distribution, he said. Communities are receiving 40 percent of their income from transfer payments and rents and interests and dividends mostly held by the elderly.

This creates problems for the younger generation in finding jobs, he said.

One approach to generating jobs in rural areas is by examining alternative health care delivery systems.

"Many communities are experiencing difficulty in retaining rural hospitals," he said. "We will examine alternative health care delivery systems which would help rural communities retain their social viability."

Flora said any benefits the communities might gain through KCRI depend on the community.

"We cannot help a community that does not have organization and some optimism," Flora said.

The center will foster communication and cooperation between K-State's many programs already working on solutions to problems, Flora said. These programs include the Cooperative Extension Service, the Center for Rural Education and Small Schools, the Small Business Development Center, the Division of Continuing Education, and the Engineering Energy Extension Service.

Flora said KCRI hopes to create a network with state agencies, other colleges and community colleges. The center and the Division of Continuing Education are planning a tele-net course on community development for community leaders.

Flora said the center will put together a major grant proposal and several smaller proposals targeting specific need areas to help with the funding of the center.

Violent crime rate decreases for U.S.

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — America's rate of violent crime declined overall from 1981 to 1985, despite an increase in the rate of violence among relatives, the Justice Department said Sunday.

Thirty-seven percent of the violent crimes by strangers in 1985 involved weapons, compared with 42 percent in 1973, the department's Bureau of Justice Statistics reported.

The bureau, which based its findings on semi-annual interviews with some 128,000 people 12 years old and older, said the amount of gratuitous violence in crimes by strangers declined since the mid-1970s.

The agency said it is difficult to measure gratuitous violence, in which the victim does not resist but is injured anyway, because the circumstances surrounding the attack vary from case to case.

From 1973 to 1977, 26 percent to 28 percent of the victims who did not fight back were injured.

Selling of 3.2 beer may be abolished

Retail, convenience store owners argue

By Alison Neely
Staff Writer

For avid 3.2 beer drinkers, the future may hold drastic changes. Since liquor by the drink became law, many Kansans have questioned the need for beer containing 3.2 percent alcohol by weight. In fact, retail liquor store owners have come into conflict with grocery and convenience store owners over the issue. "It has become a competitive argument between the retailers and grocery store owners. The consumers are not considered at all," said Neal Whitaker, executive director of the Kansas Beer Wholesalers Association. Grocery and convenience store owners are concerned that retail sellers have a monopoly on the "strong beer" market. They want the chance to compete in this market through the abolishment of 3.2 beer. Retailers oppose the abolition of 3.2 beer. Greg Mayer, owner of Mayer Retail Liquor, said his business could be drastically harmed if Kansas becomes a one-strength beer state. "As long as there's 3.2 beer in the grocery stores, the liquor stores can still sell stronger beer. Almost 50 percent of my sales are in beer," he said. Grocery and convenience stores have banded together for the first time to lobby for doing away with 3.2 beer — also known as cereal malt beverage. Calling their coalition the Kansas Cereal Malt Beverage, the group's first efforts are lobbying against 3.2 percent beer, Whitaker said. Direct Store Delivery Buyer for Dillons Corporation Dale Lightcap supports the group's work. "With the age change we'd love to be able to sell strong beer and be on a parity basis with the liquor stores," he said. Dillons 3.2 sales have dropped substantially for two reasons: the loss of individuals who are old enough to drink and the reduced advertising of beer. The recent changes in Kansas liquor laws have influenced the idea of making Kansas a one-strength beer state. The state's legal drinking age is now 21. Previously those 18 to 21 years of age could legally drink 3.2 percent beer. Many restaurants have taken advantage of the liquor by the drink law. This has caused some taverns, which previously served 3.2 beer, to become private clubs or liquor by the drink establishments. In addition to 3.2 percent beer, restaurants having liquor by the drink licenses are now allowed to purchase strong beer from the beer wholesalers. Another impact on the consumption of 3.2 beer in the future is price. ■ See BEER, Page 18

Students visit bars away from Aggieville

By Corbin Novolny
Collegian Reporter

Since the Riley County Police Department has been attempting to reduce the number of minors in Aggieville, the crowd is moving into other bars and taverns, said Charlie Busch, owner of Charlie's Neighborhood Bar. Alvan Johnson, director of the RCPD, doesn't see it quite the same way. "We're just policing all of the bars, including those in Aggieville, as a matter of routine police duty," he said. "Law enforcement is a matter of selective enforcement based on priority — what's more important than something else," Johnson said. "We routinely enforce the age based on our observation of violations in the taverns...it's not something that's on top of the priority list." For a minor's possession of a cereal malt beverage, first time offenders are fined $25, with $28 court costs. For a minor's possession of liquor and 6 percent beer, the fine is $50 and $28 court costs. Second time offenders of each charge are usually fined double the previous amount, but the penalty is left to the judge's discretion. Each bar is allowed to set its individual policy on the admittance of ■ See ALCOHOL, Page 18

For once you're not the one being grilled. On IBM Exam Day, a special demonstration on campus, you can put the new IBM Personal System/2 Model 25 to the test.

The Model 25 Colegiat is fully prepared for any examination. It comes with a generous 640KB memory, two 3.5" diskette drives and a financial aid package every student can appreciate—a big discount, plus a mouse and lots of software, including Microsoft® Windows 1.04, Write, Paint, Cardfile and IBM DOS 3.3.

And once this test is over, you can order a Collegiate from your IBM Education Product Coordinator on campus. To help improve your own test scores.

See the Model 25 and other Personal System/2 models Monday, November 2 in the K-State Union Courtyard.

Not wanting to end his remarks there, Taylor blasted Sooner quarterback Jamelle Hollieway, saying, "I'm quicker and am a better passer than he is."

Put up or shut up, Steve. I, for one, am hoping he performs like he says he can. The only thing more cocky than an Oklahoma basketball team is an Oklahoma football team, and I'd love it if the Sooners got drilled by Nebraska. I doubt there would be anyone lying around on the sidelines in sweats then.

■ It was great to see Tom Watson win the Nabisco golf tourney in San Antonio, Texas, this past weekend. Watson, who hadn't won since June 1984, took the tourney in typical Watson fashion, scrambling all over the course en route to the win.

Up by only a single stroke approaching the par three 18th hole, Watson boldly went for the flagstick — and it paid off nicely. The ball ended up five feet from the hole, and Tommy rolled in a birdie putt to win the tourney by two strokes.

It's great to see such a classy competitor back at the top of his game. So many had written Watson off, and he quieted most of them Sunday.

■ Finally, let's take a look at the increasingly unstable situation in Kansas City — home of the 1-6 Chiefs.

This team has as much talent as any in the NFL, and yet we all know what has happened since the season-opening win over San Diego.

Bill Kenney is back as the No. 1 quarterback and Carlos Carson is an important part of the offense once more, and those moves will help the team immeasurably.

But one must wonder where the vaunted Chiefs secondary, rated by many as the best in the business, has gone.

Burned by Jim McMahon and Willie Gault for two long scores in the Bears' 31-28 win over Kansas City Sunday, the unit appears more vulnerable than it has in recent memory.

On top of the secondary woes, the Chiefs had a field goal attempt blocked against Chicago. That's right, the best special teams unit in the business is in trouble as well.

Simply put, if KC can't rely on its defense and special teams, no effort by Kenney — regardless of how fantastic — will keep this team from finishing with a record of 1-14.

Showers, fans upgrade apartments

By Debbie Lyons
Collegian Reporter

Building by building, total renovations are being performed at Jardine Terrace Apartments costing an average of $140,000 per building.

The face-lifts are ongoing processes — one building is renovated each year, said Gene Wiley, supervisor of housing maintenance. It takes six to seven months to complete each building, with the renovations starting July 1 and finishing about Jan. 15 each year, he said.

The buildings were built in 1957 through 1962 and are out-of-date, Wiley said.

"We try to upgrade them," he said.

In order to upgrade the apartments, showers are installed in all of the apartments and exhaust fans are put into bathrooms with no windows. "We are trying to make everything as safe as we possibly can," he said.

New kitchen ranges are also installed which further upgrade the apartments. The new ranges are gas fueled and have an electric ignition to replace the open pilot light, he said. In addition, ground-fault outlets are installed in the kitchen and bathroom. These outlets have individual breakers that turn themselves off, Wiley said.

New windows and window sills, refrigerators, door locks, floor tiles and blinds are some of the other replacements made in the apartments.

Although the current renovation of building D is at least two months behind schedule, Wiley said he expects to have 12 apartments in the 24-apartment building completed by Dec. 1.

cost $100,000, so I think we are doing this very inexpensively," Rathbone said.

If the feasibility study is completed by Aug. 31, 1988, then one could be open by Sept. 1, he said.

The city is funding $12,000 and the University is giving $15,000 for the project. The State of Kansas, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, and Pottawatomie, Geary and Riley counties are expected to provide an additional $31,000 for the study.

The most important thing about planning an incubator is not to compromise on the feasibility study and business plan, said Carlos Morales, executive director of the National Business Incubation Association.

Incubators are a risky business, Rathbone said.

"You will find that half of these (incubators) will fail around the country," he said.

"The most difficult incubator to run is one that is tied with a school, because you have to run an incubator like a business — not a project — or it will fail," Morales said.

No two incubators are the same, so it's hard to compare them, Morales said. There are 240 incubators in the nation.

He said the cost of these studies ranges from $15,000 to $100,000.

Production is going to become more expensive for the smaller breweries, many of which produce a large variety of the less expensive beers.

"It's going to become increasingly harder to supply 3.2 in the packages (the brewers) are now," Whitaker said. Many of the breweries will have to restrict production to the more popular brands.

Currently, liquor stores sell "strong beers" ranging from premium beer containing 3.8 percent to 3.9 percent alcohol to imported beer, known as super premium, which has 5.5 percent to 6.0 percent alcohol. The containers, however, do not specify the exact alcohol content.

The actual alcohol content may not be what is specified on the containers, said Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel Retail Liquor. In the brewing process there is not an exact measure of what the alcohol content will be. "There's no way you can make the same beer twice," he said.

As a new addition to the market, light beers have become increasingly popular, Lightcap said. Of the top six cereal malt beverage items, five are light beers.

Light beer, also known as low calorie beer, usually contains between 3.3 percent to 3.6 percent alcohol by weight.

minors.

The drinking age policy at The Fishbowl and The Dougout is strictly 21 after 8 p.m. Before then, minors are allowed in to eat if accompanied by a parent or guardian, said Doug Long, owner of the two establishments.

"(The police) don't come down so hard on me at The Dougout, but they come in (The Fishbowl) every night," Long said. "(The police) coming in doesn't bother me."

"We're getting a good college clientele," he said. "(The Fishbowl) is just a place to drink and party. When a good song comes on that (the crowd) likes, they get out of their booths and dance."

The Blue River Pub only admits minors on weekends when the bar has bands or strippers as entertainment.

"I've seen a few more (college students) in the last couple of weeks," said Michele Jonas, one of the owners of The Blue River Pub. "This tavern usually pertains to the locals. When I have a known band out here, it'll pick up a little."

Defense secretary intending to resign

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger intends to resign this week and will be replaced by President Reagan's national security adviser, Frank Carlucci, sources said Monday night. The sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Reagan approved the appointment in recent days and it would be announced Thursday.

Carlucci will be replaced by his deputy at the National Security Council, Lt. Gen. Colin L. Powell, was learned.

Sources have said Weinberger's decision to step down after seven years came for personal reasons rather than any dissatisfaction with the prospective arms control treaty with the Soviet Union or any other policy disagreement with the president.

Weinberger has been an unyielding supporter of the Reagan administration's defense buildup, and in the early years of the administration presided over an enormous buildup in the nation's military.

Gorbachev sees need to restrain

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev accused his Kremlin critics Monday of being either too timid or too impatient about the pace of reform, and advised "revolutionary self-restraint" in the drive to modernize the Soviet Union.

The Soviet leader said Josef Stalin committed "enormous and unforgivable" crimes and announced resumption of a campaign to rehabilitate the dictator's victims. He also praised the communist state's second leader, however, for collectivizing agriculture and industrializing the country.

Gorbachev's nationally televised speech, which lasted 2 hours and 4 minutes, was part of the 70th anniversary observance of the 1917 revolution that brought the communists to power.

It was his first address since the While Kansas' unemployment rate fell from 4.2 percent in August to 4.1 percent in September, Riley County's unemployment rate remained steady at 2.9 percent.

"There is a tendency for people to think that employment and unemployment are related. They aren't and they shouldn't be treated separately," said Kathy Smith, public information director for the Department of Human Resources.

Riley County's employment was 24,938 in August and 27,165 in September. The unemployment figure was 753.

Winter Intersession

January 2-12, 1988

Registration:
December 7-9, 1987
Farrell Library Basement

INTERSESSION—WINTER AT KSU

The two weeks between Fall and Spring Semesters are a special time at KSU — parking is easy, and life on campus is extremely pleasant. Intersession is an excellent way to take courses — it allows the student to pursue one course intensively, without interruptions and demands of other coursework or other campus activities. Classes generally meet about three hours a day. Over 600 students will be enrolling in undergraduate or graduate classes, making their holiday season a festival of learning and sharing. It's a productive way to conquer the after-Christmas blahs.

Winter '88 Intersession offers 34 credit courses — mostly 1 or 2 credits each — from a wide variety of departments and colleges within KSU. Tuition and registration procedures are explained in this schedule. If this publication doesn't answer all your questions, please call the Division of Continuing Education at 532-5566 (toll-free in Kansas, 1-800-432-8222). Questions about specific course content or requirements should be addressed to individual instructors.

REGISTRATION

Intersession is open to KSU students and to the public. Prior enrollment at KSU is not necessary and registration is a simple one-step process.

Intersession registration will take place in the BASEMENT OF FARRELL LIBRARY; registration dates are December 7-9 and the registration staff will be available from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. those three days. Additional registration will be accepted from 8:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. Monday through Friday at 317 Umberger Hall from December 10 through the first day of class.

Tuition is due at the time of enrollment. (Some lab and materials fees are also due at this time. See schedule.) The decision as to which courses will "go" will be based on the number of registrations recorded by 4:00 p.m. on December 9. The go/drop list will be posted near the Information Desk in the K-State Union on Monday, December 14; go/drop information will also be available from the Continuing Education Registration office (317 Umberger, 532-5566).

Students unable to enroll in person December 7-9 may phone or mail in their registration. These registrations will be processed (in the order in which they are received) ONLY if spaces remain in the class as of 4:00 p.m. on December 7. Students may request a friend to enroll for them to maximize their chances of getting into their first-choice class.

Students are asked to check with their advisers to ensure that the Intersession class will meet degree requirements.

Students must show written evidence of payment of any financial delinquency to the university in order to register for Intersession.

BE PROMPT!!

Although registrations in most "go" classes will be accepted until the first day of Intersession, students are encouraged to register during the December 7-9 registration period at Farrell Library. The "go/drop" decision is based on enrollments collected during that period. Delays in student registration could result in courses being cancelled; students interested in Intersession courses should register early to be sure their preferred classes have a good chance of going as scheduled.

LATE ENROLLMENTS

A $10.00 late fee will be charged for enrollments after the second class meeting ends, but before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed. A late fee of $25 will be charged for late enrollments after one-third of the class meetings have elapsed but before two-thirds of the class meetings have elapsed. NO ENROLLMENTS WILL BE ACCEPTED AFTER TWO-THIRDS OF THE CLASS MEETINGS HAVE ELAPSED.

COSTS

Tuition is $43 per undergraduate (UG) credit hour and $62 per graduate (G) credit hour and is due at the time of enrollment; tuition is the same for Kansas residents and for non-residents. Some classes will require lab fees, materials fees, or other costs, and these are indicated in the course listing. The lab and materials fees will be collected at registration. Lab and materials fees collected by Continuing Education are non-refundable after the go/drop decision has been posted (December 14), except for courses which have been cancelled. Travel arrangements, for courses requiring them, must be made with the instructors as early as possible.

CREDIT

The maximum credit allowed is three (3) hours per student. Anyone wishing to enroll in more than three credit hours must have written approval from his or her academic dean at the time of registration. STUDENTS WISHING TO SIGN UP FOR COURSES ON AN A-PASS-FAIL BASIS MUST DO SO AT THE TIME OF REGISTRATION, OR BEFORE ONE-THIRD OF THE CLASS MEETINGS HAVE ELAPSED.

RETAKES

Undergraduate students may retake a course during Intersession in order to improve their grade. Students must indicate "Retake" on the enrollment form when they register for the course.

AUDIT

Intersession courses may not be audited; all students attending class must pay tuition.

GRADES

Intersession grades will be averaged into the student's KSU G.P.A. Grades will be mailed to students beginning February 1, 1988.

INCOMPLETE POLICY

If an "I" is received during Intersession, and if the student does not make up the "I" during the first semester enrolled in a KSU course after receiving it, a grade may be given by the faculty member without further consultation with the student. If after the end of the first semester, the "I" remains on the record, it will be designated as "IX" for record-keeping purposes and will be computed in the student's GPA, weighted at 0 points per credit (the same number of points earned by a grade of "F"). The designation of "NR" (no grade reported) will be treated in a like manner.

CANCELLED CLASSES

No individual notification about cancelled classes will be made. The "go/drop" notice will be posted in the K-State Union near the Information Desk on December 14. Students may also phone 532-5566 after that date to inquire. Students who enrolled in a cancelled class have the option of registering in another class or obtaining a full refund. Students must report to 317 Umberger Hall to officially DROP or ADD.

DROP/ADD PROCEDURE

To drop or add a course, students must submit a drop/add form (or other written notice) to the Registration Office, Division of Continuing Education, 317 Umberger Hall. Students who fail to attend class may receive an "F" unless they formally drop the course.

REFUNDS

All refund requests must be made in person or in writing to the Division Registrar, 317 Umberger Hall. A 100% refund will be issued if the request is received before the second class begins, or if the class is cancelled. A 50% refund will be issued if received after the second class begins, but before one-third of the classes have ended. NO refunds will be issued after one-third of the class meetings have ended. Lab or materials fees collected at registration are non-refundable except those for cancelled classes.

LIBRARY HOURS

As a special service to Intersession students, Farrell Library will extend its hours of operations. Library hours will be: 8:00 a.m. to 8:00 p.m., Monday through Thursday, January 4-7; 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., Friday, January 8; 8:00 a.m. to 8:00 p.m., Monday and Tuesday, January 11-12.

BOOKS

Textbooks (required or recommended) have been ordered for some classes and will be available at Varney's Bookstore at the start of Intersession. Information about textbooks is available from the instructor or from Varney's, classes for which textbooks have been ordered are indicated with the letters TB at the end of the course description in this listing.

Defense secretary intending to resign

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger intends to resign this week and will be replaced by President Reagan's national security adviser, Frank Carlucci, sources said Monday night.

The sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Reagan approved the appointment in recent days and it would be announced Thursday.

Carlucci will be replaced by his deputy at the National Security Council, Lt. Gen. Colin L. Powell, was learned.

Sources have said Weinberger's decision to step down after seven years came for personal reasons rather than any dissatisfaction with the prospective arms control treaty with the Soviet Union or any other policy disagreement with the president.

Weinberger has been an unyielding supporter of the Reagan administration's defense buildup, and in the early years of the administration presided over an enormous buildup in the nation's military.

Pronouncing English as a Second Language (NON-CREDIT)
Instr. Sharon Reagan. January 4, 7, 8, 30, 1988. Monday, January 4, a 1/2 hour speech analysis. January 7-8, 9:00 a.m.-7:00 p.m. an Intensive Workshop. January 30, 9:00 a.m.-3:00 p.m. a wrap-up session. Fairchild Hall, Room 204

At the initial session each person's speech is taped and subsequently analyzed. Based on this analysis, an individualized instruction program is formulated and specialized practice materials are recorded on cassettes. The workshop will provide two full days of intensive instruction and participation in a small group (maximum four people). At the end of the second day each person's progress is evaluated and a three-week practice program is established during which a participant works with a personal set of practice tapes. Students then return for a final session.

Defense secretary intending to resign

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger intends to resign this week and will be replaced by President Reagan's national security adviser, Frank Carlucci, sources said Monday night.

The sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Reagan approved the appointment in recent days and it would be announced Thursday.

Carlucci will be replaced by his deputy at the National Security Council, Lt. Gen. Colin L. Powell, it was learned.

Sources have said Weinberger's decision to step down after seven years came for personal reasons rather than any dissatisfaction with the prospective arms control treaty with the Soviet Union or any other policy disagreement with the president.

Weinberger has been an unyielding supporter of the Reagan administration's defense buildup, and in the early years of the administration, presided over an enormous buildup in the nation's military.

Gorbachev sees need to restrain

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev accused his Kremlin critics Monday of being either too timid or too impatient about the pace of reform, and advised "revolutionary self-restraint" in the drive to modernize the Soviet Union.

The Soviet leader said Josef Stalin committed "enormous and unforgivable" crimes and announced resumption of a campaign to rehabilitate the dictator's victims. He also praised the communist state's second leader, however, for collectivizing agriculture and industrializing the country.

Gorbachev's nationally televised speech, which lasted 2 hours and 41 minutes, was part of the 70th anniversary observance of the 1917 revolution that brought the communists to power.

Final debate leads into election

President hopefuls give views

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reporter

Candidates for student body president had their final chance Monday evening to voice their opinions on such issues as selective admissions and funding for Farrell Library. The debate, sponsored by Putnam Hall and Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, was conducted in the living room of Putnam Hall.

The debate began with opening statements from the three official candidates followed by a formal question-and-answer period in which the candidates were allowed to question each other. Candidates also answered questions from the audience.

When asked how they would rank, in order of importance, various campus projects — such as the renovation of Calvin Hall, funding for Farrell and the addition of a campus museum — all three candidates ranked the library as their top priority.

"The library is just something that has to be dealt with," said Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics. "I am getting kind of sick of going to other campuses and seeing the library being the center of attention. Here I feel it is kind of an embarrassment."

Speaking about the Board of Regents' proposal for selective admissions, Troy Lubbers, junior in marketing, said, "They are looking at this in a very one-minded sense."

When asked by Muir which universities would have the most to lose by the plan, Lubbers said, "First of all, K-State would be probably No. 1, Fort Hays (State University No. 2) and Pittsburg (State University No. 3). Basically, the only one that stands to gain a tremendous amount by the way of monies and students...would be (the University of Kansas)."

Jack Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, voiced his concern about the selective admissions policy cutting out classes below the 100 level. Taylor thinks these remedial classes, such as study skills, are essential to many students.

"If we keep our current open admissions policy we will be able to have the classes, those classes below the 100 level, for the students

In their closing statements, the candidates outlined their stand on the issues of the election. In addition to his statements, Taylor made a plea to students to vote.

"I don't care if you vote for me, Troy, Pat (or) Monte — just get people to realize that this is their student government. ...Please go out and vote tomorrow," Taylor said.

Monte Couchman, sophomore in secondary education, who is running as a write-in candidate, was not allowed to participate in the debate.

"I talked to all of the members (of KSUARH) and based on past decisions, we decided that only those candidates on the ballot would be able to participate," said Walt De Backer, senior in finance and debate coordinator.

Riley County's unemployment rate remains steady

By Staff and Wire Reports

While Kansas' unemployment dropped from 4.2 percent in August to 4 percent in September, Riley County's unemployment remained steady at 2.9 percent.

"There is a tendency for people to think that employment and unemployment are related. They aren't and they need to be treated separately," said Kathy Ketchum, public information director for the Kansas Department of Human Resources.

Riley County's employment figure was 24,938 in August and 27,165 in September. The unemployment figure was 753 in August and 819 in September.

U.S. productivity jumps 2.6 percent/Page 12

"The labor force did climb, but the rate remained the same," Ketchum said.

The beginning of the school year and the change in seasons were reasons the rate dropped, she said.

"There was a strong increase in government employment. It rose 225 — that's probably from state and local schools. The key in the market is the seasonal change," Ketchum said.

The state's drop brings Kansas to its lowest level since June, 1981, when the jobless rate dropped to 3.7 percent. The state's highest unemployment rate was 6.9 percent in the summer of 1971 and in January 1983.

The state's jobless rate hit a five-year low at 4.4 percent last May, before inching back up to 4.6 percent in June. It continued its downward slide to 4.4 percent in July, 4.2 percent in August and 4 percent in September.

Last year in September, the unemployment rate in Kansas was 5 percent.

"The beginning of the new school year brought improvements to the Kansas labor market in September with 18,500 workers, mostly school workers, added to the state and local government payrolls," said Dennis Taylor, secretary of the department of human resources, who released the figures. "We also saw significant gains in the retail trade industry."

Kansas' jobless rate was lower than the national rate, which was 5.7 percent.

Employment was up from 1,185,461 people in August to 1,192,443 in September, the report said. By contrast, the number of people working in Kansas in September 1986 was 1,165,911.

The department's report said there were 49,315 people looking for work in the state in September, down from 52,531 in August and down from 61,318 in September of last year.

So far this year, the state's manufacturing industry has added 4,200 jobs. Oil and gas extraction gained 1,300 jobs, indicating a rebound by that industry after it was hit by low crude prices.

Transportation and public utilities has gained 1,000 jobs during the year, trades have gained 3,600 jobs; finance, insurance, and real estate gained 1,400 jobs; services grew by 5,700 workers and government gained 2,300 employees.

Petitioners may oust Mecham

PHOENIX, Ariz. — Opponents of Gov. Evan Mecham capped a four-month recall drive Monday by filing petitions that they said contained 388,988 signatures, nearly twice as many as needed to force an election that could oust the maverick Republican.

If enough signatures are validated by the secretary of state, the embattled governor who took office in January will have to either resign or fight to retain his job in the recall election, which would take place next spring at the earliest.

"Mecham is going to face a recall election," Mecham Recall Committee founder Ed Buck said Monday. He said he saw "no possibility" that so many names would be invalidated that the petition drive would fail.

Buck said the committee collected 388,988 signatures for Monday's filing with the secretary of state's office. Additional signatures might be turned in on Tuesday's deadline, he said.

The committee needs 216,746 valid signatures of the state's 1.3 million registered voters to force a recall election. Buck has long said he wanted 350,000 names to provide a cushion in case a large number were invalidated.

Salina woman found dead

SALINA — The death of an elderly woman whose body was found outside her home during the weekend is being investigated as a homicide, Salina Police Capt. Gary Hindman said Monday.

Hindman reported no leads in the death of Mildred H. Hawkes, 85. A passerby found her body near her home Saturday morning. Saline County Coroner David Clark said an autopsy showed she died of heart failure, complicated by exposure.

Iceberg sighted by Argentina

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — A 450-foot-high iceberg has been sighted near shipping lanes off southern Argentina, the government news agency Telam reported Monday.

Satellite photographs from the national weather service showed the 2100-foot-wide iceberg about 310 miles northwest of the Falkland Islands and 1,360 miles south of Buenos Aires, the report said.

Telam said the iceberg did not pose a threat to shipping. The crew from an Australian ship, the Australian Venture, said radar also indicated the existence of two other icebergs of similar dimensions about 415 nautical miles east-northeast of the Falkland Islands.

Weather forecasters said the icebergs are believed to have broken off from Antarctica several months ago and drifted northward.

Fund to pay for sabbaticals

WASHINGTON — The National Endowment for the Humanities said Monday it will sponsor paid sabbaticals for one elementary or high school teacher from each state to study the humanities.

The "teacher-scholars" chosen for the program will be paid stipends equivalent to their salaries, up to $27,500 each.

The program will allow teachers to take time off from their classroom duties to study history, literature, foreign languages and other humanities.

King Tut's gold to be sold

LONDON — A 9-inch-long sheet of gold from Tutankhamen's tomb will be auctioned next month and could fetch up to $250,000, Christie's auctioneers said.

The gold sheet is believed to be the only item ever to reach the market from the Egyptian boy king's 3,000-year-old grave.

The gold, which depicts Tutankhamen between the gods Atum and Re Herakhty, is believed to have been stolen from the tomb near Luxor.

"A piece like this has never come on the market before and the fact that it comes from Tutankhamen's tomb will give it added attraction," Dr. Christine Insley Green, a Christie's consultant, said Sunday.

She estimated it would fetch $86,000 to $258,000.

Representative sworn in TOPEKA — Rep. Isabelle "Belle" Borum, R-Wichita, was sworn in Monday afternoon by Secretary of State Bill Graves. She will represent the 88th District in the House of Representatives.

Borum, 61, a retired teacher, was selected by the precinct committee members in her district to replace Sandy Duncan, who resigned to become commissioner for administrative services at the Department of Social and Rehabilitative Services.

U.S. frigate fires on vessels

MANAMA, Bahrain — An American frigate escorting a refueling tanker fired machine guns to chase off three small vessels that approached "by surprise" and may have been Iranian, U.S. military officials said Monday.

The Pentagon said the dhow and two speedboats approached about dusk Sunday as the Navy ships passed a Persian Gulf island Iran has used as a speedboat base for attacks on shipping in its 7-year-old war with Iraq.

Pentagon spokesmen said the USS Carr fired .50-caliber machine guns at the vessels, which were "suspected" to be Iranian, but none was known to have been hit and all left the scene.

American officials in the gulf said privately it was not certain whether they were Iranian craft threatening the U.S. ships or fishing boats of another nationality.

Charles, Di appear happy

BONN, West Germany — Prince Charles and Princess Diana greeted a crowd of more than 2,000 West Germans on Monday, and the royal couple showed no hint of the disharmony that the British press says is plaguing their marriage.

Charles and Diana, smiling broadly and walking side-by-side, spent nearly a half-hour greeting the crowd outside City Hall. Clusters of West Germans cheered the royal couple and yelled greetings in English and German, and many waved British flags.

It was the West German public's first opportunity to get a close look at Charles, 38, and Diana, 26, whose six-year marriage has been followed closely by the British news media.

The prince and his wife are on a week-long visit to West Germany aimed at underscoring friendship between the two nations.

Forum highlights include discussion about Constitution

By Jan Schwartz
Collegian Reporter

Personal freedom and the Constitution dominated discussion Monday night at the final pre-convention forum of the fall semester.

The forum was in preparation for Michael Kammen, a Pulitzer Prize-winning historian who will speak at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

Three speakers presented their opinions, each concerning a different aspect of the Constitution and how it relates to society today.

Don Nieman, associate professor of history, discussed the theory of the Constitution's original intent; Robert Shoop, professor of administration and foundations of education, spoke on the lack of constitutional documentation for women's rights; and District Judge Richard Rogers, Topeka, presented his views on the Constitution and the courts.

The theory of the Constitution's original intent proposes that people should interpret the document the way its framers originally intended, Nieman said.

He said the proponents of this theory argue it is in keeping with the doctrines' popular sovereignty since the Constitution and its amendments are adopted through the democratic process.

"If we operate through the theory of original intent, it would curb the power of unelected judges," Nieman said. "Judges wouldn't be free to run amok with the Constitution, reading their own views into it."

He said one of the problems Kammen has identified is that Americans' understanding of fundamental concepts has changed along with American culture.

"The Constitution is not set in stone," Nieman said. "It is framed in very general language and contains broad generalities which provide incentive for debate."

Shoop said liberty has been placed above equality and it is a "constitutional myth" the document guarantees all rights to all Americans.

"It is important to realize that at the time the Constitution was written, the term 'man' was not meant in a generic sense. Women were not included in the original intent of the Constitution," Shoop said.

Professors awarded grant $295,000 to aid genetics teaching

By Brad Fanshier
Collegian Reporter

The teaching of modern genetics in high school classrooms got a shot in the arm this fall when three K-State professors were awarded a $295,000 grant by the National Science Foundation.

Angelo Collins, assistant professor of curriculum and instruction, Tom Manney and Dean Zollman, professors of physics, received the grant. The three will use the two-year grant to train high school and junior high school science teachers in better ways to teach genetics.

Collins said a need for this program among teachers exists throughout the country.

"Almost three years ago, three different national surveys were done of high school teachers, and in all of those surveys, genetics was recognized as a very important subject to teach, but extremely difficult to teach," Collins said.

Collins said this difficulty in teaching is because of the analytical nature of the subject and the lack of good hands-on exercises students can do in the classroom.

Manney said the program had its beginnings in a workshop offered by K-State for high school and junior high science teachers. Part of this early workshop dealt with the genetic effects of radiation on living organisms, he said.

"That (part of the workshop) seemed to be well received and also turned out to be an area that was really new to the teachers," Manney said.

The unique feature of the new teaching program is its use of yeast as a study organism. Manney said there are several advantages to using yeast in the classroom.

"Yeast is the simplest organism that does things the way higher organisms do genetically," Manney said.

Its simplicity makes yeast a good model system for studying biological functions — including reproduction — of higher organisms, he said.

Experiments involving yeast are also inexpensive and easy to do, Manney said. He also said the experiments take one or two days instead of several weeks, and the results can easily be seen under a microscope.

Another feature of the program is a computer bulletin board enabling teachers to communicate after they have taken the workshop. Zollman said since it is unlikely two teachers from the same town will take the workshop, a way for them to communicate when they have questions or want to share what they have learned should be developed.

"What we need is a system to get those teachers to communicate with each other and to support them from here in trying to get the genetics work they learned here into their own classrooms. If we were in New York City, we would give them all subway tokens and they would get together once a month," Zollman said.

Because of the distance between Kansas towns and the difficulty of getting people together on the telephone, the computer system is being set up, he said. Teachers will be able to call the system and take notes from the computer or put information into the computer for other teachers to read.

The program is now in the planning and organizational stage, the researchers said. The first half of the workshop will be held in July 1988 for 30 teachers. The second section will be in July 1989 for another 30 teachers.

While the group sees the program as important for the 60 Kansas teachers involved, they also see a long-term effect with a broader impact.

"Once we've been through experiences with 60 teachers from very different settings and all teaching very different types of students and revise the materials, we should have a good package of materials that can be used anywhere to teach this sort of thing," Zollman said. "So I think it's highly likely that four or five years from now we will have had an impact not only within the state but elsewhere."

Newspaper, yearbook adviser named to national office

By The Collegian Staff

Dave Adams, director of Student Publications Inc. and associate professor of journalism and mass communications, was named national president of College Media Advisers at the annual CMA/Associated Collegiate Press convention last weekend in St. Louis.

Student Publications is publisher of the Kansas State Collegian and the Royal Purple.

Adams will coordinate ACP/CMA functions and be responsible for appointing committee members. He said his goals are to strengthen the ties between not only the collegiate and professional press but also between the collegiate and high school levels.

In addition, Adams said he will emphasize recruiting and involving minorities in CMA.

Adams assumed the position last Sunday and will relinquish it Nov. 1, 1989.

U.S. foreign policy blunders pervasive

While the nation feigns recovery from the "disturbing" revelations of the Iran-Contra hearings, it seems to ignore all other instances in which federal agencies of ill repute (such as the CIA) interfere with the affairs of another nation. Sadly enough, Central America isn't America's only playpen. Halfway around the world, in southern Africa, our government continues to sponsor the suffering and deaths of innocent people, this time in conjunction with none other than racist South Africa.

The object of our intrusion in this case is Angola, and the terrorist group in question is the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). No, they aren't the Contras, but there are many similarities.

For one, both groups can be said to rely on the effective strategy of terror to enlist popular support. Whereas the Contras bomb hospitals and murder innocent peasants, UNITA kills health workers and teachers educating the rural poor. According to a recent article in "In These Times," UNITA's indiscriminate use of land mines has created some 20,000 amputees which must be supported by the government. A UNICEF report also estimated that more than 240,000 children died unnecessarily between 1981 and 1986 due to violence generated by clashes between UNITA and the Angolan government.

Why does the United States support UNITA? What better justification in this era of actor-turned-president other than the fact that Angola's government is communist? The Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), the ruling party in Angola, relies on Cuban and Soviet aid to counter the military efforts of UNITA and South Africa, as well as to feed a country which has had half of its farmland destroyed by terrorist land mines. Washington is very keen to support (even if anonymously so) a group which can boast having 60,000 troops and firmly established footholds in rural Angola. And, of course, we mustn't forget the ever-present factor of American business interests in a nation such as Angola, which happens to be very rich in strategic minerals including oil, uranium, chrome and cobalt. Furthermore, American-sponsored pressure on Angola is paramount to a maintenance of the status quo in southern Africa — one in which South Africa can dominate the region.

South Africa, on its part, is eager to see the downfall of Angola for very specific reasons. Angola serves as a haven for both the African National Congress and the Southwest African People's Organization, two militant groups which oppose apartheid in South Africa. South Africa makes no pretense as to the threat Angola poses to white supremacy in southern Africa. For the first time in several years, South Africa openly admitted direct involvement in the conflict by recently invading Angola with at least four full infantry battalions, and conducting extensive aerial and artillery strikes.

Meanwhile, the American conservative press, typified by the "National Review," describes UNITA as "not only the best hope for democracy in Angola, but the only realistic hope for common sense, realism, and harmony in the whole of southern Africa." Unsurprisingly, the "National Review" has also praised the likes of Robert Bork, Oliver North and countless other conservative zealots.

Conservatives claim the Soviet Union dictates the nature of affairs in Angola, and that it is the duty of our nation to halt communist expansion. By making Angola the crux of an East versus West conflict of ideologies, a misuse of power, such as actions taken by North, Richard Secord and late CIA director William Casey in the Contragate scandal seem justifiable. In fact, illegal proceedings have probably already taken place.

For example, during the Iran-Contra hearings, Saudi Arabian businessman Sam Barnich reported that despite the fact that the Clark Amendment prohibited American aid to Angolan rebels from 1976 to 1985, Saudi Arabia diverted more than $50 million from the United States to UNITA in 1983. Last May, the bimonthly periodical "Africa Report" published a report stating that the United States has indirectly sent illegal aid to UNITA through Saudi Arabia, Israel and Zaire since 1982.

Congress is presently faced with the debate on whether aid to UNITA should be overt or covert. On one side, hard-line conservative senator and presidential hopeful Bob Dole preaches the end of the Angolan communist government. However, some liberals, such as New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley, urge that the matter be openly debated, in order to stimulate public awareness of the subject.

American intervention in Nicaragua and other Central American countries has become a debated issue in Congress as well as among the American people. However, there is much more going on throughout the world, and we cannot ignore other blunders of American foreign policy, no matter how distant they may be.

Prevention, not image, should be city's concern

The City Commission's concern about the way a possible disturbance after this year's K-State-University of Kansas football game on Nov. 7 will be reported by news gathering organizations here and across the country is foolish.

Commissioners should concentrate on the task of preventing a future disturbance and not on "how it will play in Peoria."

Or, rather, commissioners should have concentrated on preventing a disturbance after the game instead of leaving the preparations for a possible disaster in the hands of the Riley County Police Department and the Aggieville Merchants Association.

While Aggieville merchants have a financial stake in what happens after this year's game and the RCPD is legally required to deal with a disturbance — should one develop — neither one is truly in a position to engage in preventive action. The plans developed by the merchants and the police only lay the groundwork to respond if there is trouble.

Commissioners could have started a high-profile dialogue with University administrators and student leaders to make the University community aware of the destruction caused by last year's revelry and to involve the student body in the outcome of the celebration — or wake — following this year's annual contest between the two football teams.

Perhaps private security guards would not have been necessary if K-State students, whom commissioners did not blame for last year's incident, were given the responsibilities the security guards will handle.

One suggestion made by Aggieville merchants was the scheduling of an event to draw students away from the Aggieville area after the game, thus reducing the density of people in the area and the chances that a crowd filling Moro Street would transform itself into a mob.

The Merchants Association looked to the University to finance this diversion. Why didn't the city leaders take up this task and offer a concert in City Park? The services of Madonna or Michael Jackson need not have been purchased. Such an event could have included local entertainers both from the city and the campus.

It is easy to see how the commissioners backed away from leadership. With no legal responsibility for maintaining public order they could leave it to the RCPD to handle preparations to respond to a disturbance.

If there is a disturbance in Aggieville this year, press releases by commissioners or the city manager are not going to change the fact that they had an opportunity to prevent history from repeating itself — and they wasted it.

Voting is one privilege students musn't ignore

No, students who woke up this morning and found it was election day on campus didn't oversleep by a few months or so.

Today and Wednesday are election days, and students shouldn't ignore their duty and their privilege to participate in the elections.

That emphatic reminder has been said and written thousands of times, at least, but its message is no less important today than the first time it was uttered.

At stake potentially is the future of the University and the colleges that comprise it.

Senators in each of the nine colleges, members of the Board of Student Publications and, of course, the student body president will be determined sometime late Wednesday night or early Thursday morning when final results are to be tabulated, barring computer problems.

For those students who complain that voting is not convenient enough for them, Student Senate has taken steps to make that effort less strenuous.

In addition to previous locations in the Union and the Vet Med Center, polling places have been added in Cardwell Hall and Derby Food Center.

Now there's no excuse for non-participation, except maybe apathy.

And that's not an excuse — it's an affliction.

Do your duty. Vote.

Letters

Language protest

Editor,

In response to William Richter's letter in the Oct. 20 Collegian, I really must protest! Surely a department head should check his facts before embarrassing himself in a public forum.

To accuse D.M. (Deanne Marie) Gunther of being a male "trying to keep women in their place" leads me to doubt his competency to address the "issue" of sexist language. Does Richter assume that Gunther is a male because she saw fit to take issue with L.A. Wheeler over what is, after all, a rather trivial issue when compared to the issue of full equality under the law?

By the way, I also think Richter needs to be a bit more observant, seeing as how D.M. Gunther is not only in his department, but is also his neighbor.

Muir supporter

Editor,

Late last Friday afternoon I received a phone call from a friend of mine on the Collegian staff. He/she asked me if Pat Muir had asked me if he could use my name in his ad which appeared in the Oct. 28 Collegian. I hadn't given much thought to the ad because I had told Muir quite a while ago that I would support him. I told my friend that Muir did not specifically ask me if he could use my name. I did, however, explain that it did not bother me that he did use my name. I was expecting an ad to appear sooner or later with the names of Muir's supporters.

The reason I am writing this letter is because I feel that what I was quoted as saying in the Collegian article was warped so that it would appear that I was not, in fact, supporting Muir. In no way did I intend for that to come across. I wholeheartedly support Muir and wish to make that point clear. I believe it is in poor taste to misuse quotes to make them say what you want them to say. I also find it ironic that the same issue in which you libel Muir, you announce your being awarded the Pacemaker award.

Wasting time

Editor,

All this talk about sexist language is really just fine, though I feel women are merely just wasting their time. Isn't the meaning in people, not words? Don't actions speak louder than words? If I were a female, the act of being paid equal to that of a man of the same job, would speak a whole lot louder than having the company memos typed with pronouns befitting Jane as well as Rob.

Dodging cars

Editor,

Dodging cars is a great pastime for many K-State students. Ever since the first person got hit by a car, it has become more of a sport for the pedestrians and a game for the motorists. In this sport, anyone can play and no one has to sit on the bench. In this game, there are certain rules and regulations we must follow. If you don't follow the rules you are subject to a penalty. For example, if you use the crosswalk, which is against the rules, the cars will not want to play, either. However, it is very physical and causes more injuries than nearly any other sport. You also need to be very physically fit and very quick. If your reflexes are slow, you could be one of the many who are injured. The referees in this game, the police, always show up after the foul has been committed. The vehicle driver always has an excuse for his foul. A couple of excuses used several times are "He hit me first" or "He came out of nowhere and hit my windshield." Although these are good excuses, the sideline fans often disagree. Some of the vehicle drivers get quite mad when the pedestrians make a good fake and don't actually step in front of the car. Good luck dodging!

Insurance rates

Editor,

For state employees unhappy with the prospect of increasing costs and decreasing health care benefits under the plans offered, a brochure insert for Federal employees in the Nov. 1 Topeka Capital-Journal from Blue Cross and Blue Shield should adversely affect their blood pressures even more.

There is no information given on the Federal government's contributions to its health care programs. However, the brochure reveals that for $27.46 per month for singles and $53.16 per month for families, Federal employees receive: free choice of physicians, 100 percent payment of hospital services after a $100 deductible, a fee-schedule dental program with no maximum or deductible and a mail order drug service that charges $5 per filled prescription.

Why can't an organization as large as the State of Kansas negotiate a reasonably priced, statewide health care program without penalty for smoking or other aberrant lifestyles at least equally hazardous?

Student contractors earn No. 1 ranking from professionals

By Debbie Lyons
Collegian Reporter

K-State's chapter of Associated General Contractors of America recently learned it had been selected the No. 1 student chapter in the nation for projects and activities for the 1986-87 school year.

Awards are selected based on chapter projects, said Scott Korte, president of the K-State chapter and senior in construction science. Each chapter turns in a portfolio listing the previous year's activities, he said.

The K-State chapter originated in 1967 and has placed in eight national competitions, winning five first place awards, one second place, one third place and one honorable mention. The outstanding student chapter award is judged and presented by the national AGC chapter, and two students traveled to Boston to receive the award this year, Korte said.

Korte said the projects in which the chapter participates fall into three categories — campus service, community service and chapter activities.

He said the chapter has done many campus projects, including rebuilding the Kershaw Plaza, which used to be the Sigma Tau pyramid in front of Durland Hall. Building a latrine for the crew team, setting up playground equipment at Jardine Terrace Apartment and building a plaza in front of Justin Hall have also been projects for the AGC club.

In the community, Korte said the members have made tetherball courts for Lee Elementary School, built a ramp for the handicapped for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter and helped with the University for Man home repair projects. The chapter also built the "Welcome to Manhattan" sign south of town on U.S. Highway 177.

Chapter projects are yearly projects such as setting up construction science seminars, he said.

"The main objective is not only to work on projects, but to have fun," Korte said. "We're always looking for projects we can do. If anyone has an idea, all they have to do is ask us to help."

AGC is the largest trade association in the construction industry, he said. The K-State chapter has 90 members.

The chapter is self-supporting and keeps membership dues low by selling T-shirts, caps and sweatshirts with the construction science logo. Money is also earned by working on houses for residents of Manhattan. The money for the labor is then donated to the chapter and is used to travel to meetings and conferences, Korte said.

State may lose $52 million in cuts if Gramm-Rudman proposal passes

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Kansas could lose $52 million in federal monies if automatic spending cuts are triggered this year in the Gramm-Rudman deficit-cutting law, according to a new report.

Projected losses in the Sunflower State in the 1988 budget year, which began Oct. 1, would rank 32nd nationally. California would be the biggest loser with federal aid cuts of $537.8 million, according to the report prepared by Fiscal Planning Services Inc., a private Washington-based consulting firm.

The largest reductions would hit education, highways and Medicare.

Under Gramm-Rudman, across-the-board spending cuts will take effect on Nov. 20 unless Congress and the White House agree to a package to shrink the deficit $23 billion.

For Kansas, among the biggest losses will be:

- Medicare, $13.2 million.
- Highways, $12 million.
- Student aid for higher education, $5.1 million.
- Programs for educationally deprived children, $2.6 million.
- Social services block grant programs, $2.4 million.
- Community development block grant programs, $2 million.
- Unemployment services and administration, $1.6 million.
- Job Training, $1.5 million.
- Low-income energy assistance, $1.4 million.
- Handicapped education, $1.1 million.
- Grants for wastewater treatment projects, $971,000.
- Rehabilitation services, $882,000.
- Impact aid, $837,000.

- Vocational and adult education, $813,000.
- Health block grants, $778,000.
- Special programs for the aging, $671,000.
- Head start, $652,000.
- Child support enforcement, $606,000.
- Education block grant, $423,000.

The analysis projects reductions in federal monies for programs administered by state and local governments, $34 million, as well as direct aid programs such as Medicare and student financial assistance, $18.3 million. The full effect of the Gramm-Rudman cuts are not reflected, however.

The study, for example, does not estimate losses to farmers through cuts in farm subsidies.

The American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees commissioned the report, which was released last week. The cuts are expressed in terms of budget obligations — monies committed to a program by the federal government.

Fiscal Planning Services contends that obligations more accurately reflect long-range effects of the Gramm-Rudman cuts, particularly in programs such as highways where there is a long period of time between a government committing or obligating itself to a project with a contract and paying for it with outlays of cash.

An earlier report by Federal Funds Information for the States, a research arm of the National Governors' Association and the National Conference of State Legislatures, projected cuts in federal outlays of $7.8 million this year in 18 grant programs for Kansas.

ESU students seeking bar ordinance change

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — College students below the age of 21, bored in a city where even the mayor acknowledges there's a "void" of entertainment, have asked the City Commission to permit them to enter bars with their drinking-age friends.

Students at Emporia State University asked the City Commission to revise an ordinance barring those under 21 — the legal drinking age in Kansas — from the premises of certain Emporia private clubs.

One proposal calls for the hands of students aged 18 to 20 to be marked with red Xs, to distinguish them from students of drinking age, who would wear tags on their right wrists.

"Basically, (underage) students want to go into the establishments with their friends for socializing, playing pool, playing video games," said Jeff Zogleman, 22, a leader of the Associated Student Government.

Mayor Floyd McCracken acknowledged that Emporia, an eastern Kansas town of 25,000 residents, has "a real void as far as entertainment."

However, he doubts the tagging system would be enforceable.

"In a nightclub with a crowded setting, it would be literally impossible to police the thing," he said.

Although he expressed reservations about the proposal, McCracken said he would support a revised ordinance if the police gave their approval.

About 1,600 of the university's 5,400 students are between 18 and 20 years of age.

Students have sent 700 letters and post cards to city officials. On Oct. 21, when commissioners voted 4-1 to prepare an ordinance, students overflowed the City Commission chambers. The commission may look at a draft ordinance later this month.

State law does not prohibit people who are younger than the legal drinking age from entering private clubs or bars, as long as they do not drink.

Using plants to bring about changes

By Jackie Wendt
Collegian Reporter

Gardens not only provide nourishment for the body, but also contentment for the soul.

Horticultural therapy is a recognized form of health care that is an aid in therapeutic or rehabilitative processes for people of all ages or with any disabilities, said Richard Mattson, professor of horticultural therapy.

"Horticultural therapy is an adjunctive therapy utilizing plant materials in nature to bring about a change in people who are disabled,

K-State offers horticultural therapy disadvantaged or handicapped," he said. "It has a full age range with all types of disabilities involved."

Mattson said a horticultural therapist will use nature to assist in the therapy or rehabilitation of a special group.

"They work in psychiatric hospitals, correctional facilities, mental institutions and retirement centers," he said.

K-State's program, Mattson said, is the only one in the United States that has a recognized bachelor of science and master of science degree in the field.

"K-State has a lot of cooperation...which is necessary to support this."

—Richard Mattson

"K-State has a lot of cooperation among different departments, which is necessary to support this," he said.

"There is a great deal of strength with Menningers, and the continued association with Menningers has made it important in growing and manufacturing students," Mattson said. The C.F. Menninger Foundation is a world-renowned psychiatric institute based in Minnesota with branch facilities throughout the United States, including one in Topeka.

There are 31 students in the horticultural therapy program and more than 80 percent are women, he said. Also, many of the students are from different areas of the United States. "We have one student from Jordan, another from England and most are seniors," Mattson said.

The Department of Horticulture and the C.F. Menninger Foundation designed the program in 1971.

"For the first four years, we sent seniors to Menningers for their internships, but now we send them to other sites throughout the United States," Mattson said. "There are about 25 sites now, which cover a broad range of human needs."

He said there are currently five undergraduate courses at K-State for horticultural therapy.

"Horticultural therapy is unique because it is a living, dynamic media," Mattson said.

"Because a garden is alive and growing, people receive a variety of benefits from this," he said. "They receive exercise, consumption of vegetables and fruits, and they learn new job skills."

China changes leadership

Zhao reigns as Communist Party chief

By The Associated Press

BEIJING — Premier Zhao Ziyang took over as chief of the Communist Party Monday in a major leadership reshuffle that brought younger, reform-minded pragmatists to power in China.

The new line-up is the result of Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping's plan to replace an aging party leadership with new officials willing to continue his market-oriented reforms and open-door policy.

Deng, 83, stepped down from three top party posts Sunday at the conclusion of the 13th Communist Party Congress, but he was reappointed chairman of the powerful Central Military Commission, ensuring that he will play a major role in China's political future.

In retiring from his posts, Deng forced leading conservatives, most notably President Li Xiannian and economist Chun Yun, to follow suit. Li and Chen, both 82, had opposed the pace of Deng's reforms.

The way is now open for Deng and his proteges to continue decentralizing the economy and further open the nation to the West.

"He stands taller and sees farther than us," the People's Daily said Monday of the 4-foot-11-inch Deng. "He is a great man," the paper said of the French-educated revolutionary, who has been purged three times in Communist China's 38-year history.

The major surprise of the congress was the political survival of Hu Yaobang, the former party chief who lost his post after student demonstrations for democracy last December.

Hu, a liberal by Chinese standards, will not return to the Politburo's Standing Committee, the core decision-making group in the party. But he retained his seat on the Central Committee and on the Politburo itself.

It had been expected that Hu would be pushed from the Politburo.

Zhao, 68, further solidified his leadership position by being named vice chairman of the military commission. The appointment is significant because Zhao, whose power base lies in government ministries, has sought to expand his influence into the military.

Zhao said Monday he would soon step down as premier but refused to disclose his successor.

"He stands taller and sees farther than us."

—The People's Daily on Deng Xiaoping

Li Peng, a 59-year-old Soviet-educated engineer, is the only one who warrants the title of conservative — although he denies it. He is said to favor central planning and large capital projects.

Li is a leading candidate to replace Zhao as premier.

Among the new Standing Committee members, Zhao and Hu Qili, 58, are the most vocal supporters of Deng's reforms. Qiao Shi, 62, has strong ties to China's police and state security departments, while Yao Yilin, 70, is a veteran government minister and Communist Party bureaucrat.

The vitality of the new leadership was evident Monday when the five Standing Committee members, all in Western-style suits instead of Mao jackets, joined foreign and Chinese reporters at a reception in the Great Hall of the People.

In an unprecedented display of "kaifang," or openness, Zhao spent nearly an hour joking with reporters and responding to their questions, clinking glasses in good-natured toasts.

New treatment may protect against effects of radiation

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Treatment with two naturally occurring substances that stimulate bone marrow may protect against some of the most lethal consequences of radiation exposure and cancer chemotherapy, researchers said Monday.

Radiation and anti-cancer drugs both interfere with bone marrow's production of infection-fighting white blood cells. The new treatment triggers renewed production of those cells, thus lowering the likelihood of life-threatening infections, according to a report in the current issue of the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

"The period when the patient is at greatest risk of infection due to reduced white cell functions is reduced," said Dr. Malcolm Moore, a cancer specialist at the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City and principal author of the new study.

If such drugs prove successful in human trials that are now beginning, their principal use would be with cancer patients receiving chemotherapy or radiation treatment and with people suffering from other bone-marrow diseases.

Such drugs could also serve as a treatment for people exposed to radiation during nuclear war, Moore said.

A similar drug was reportedly used recently to treat two victims of accidental radiation exposure in Brazil and was credited with saving their lives.

Previous studies by Moore and others have shown that one of the substances, called granulocyte colony stimulating factor, or G-CSF, could boost numbers of the white blood cells known as neutrophils, which defend against invading bacteria.

The new study shows that another similar substance, called interleukin-1 or IL-1, also can boost the production of neutrophils in laboratory animals.

Lottery to supplement state finances

By Janel Swanson
Agri/Business Editor

Purchasing a lottery ticket is not only buying a chance to win $100,000, but it's also gaining a chance to help eliminate prison overcrowding, pay for the state's reappraisal and support economic development.

The Kansas Lottery's first tickets will be sold at noon Nov. 12. At a cost of $1 each, state officials plan on selling more than 18 million tickets in the Up and Away game, which is expected to last about 10 weeks. The length of the game will be determined by ticket sales.

Revenue from the ticket sales will be divided into three categories: 45 cents for prizes; 25 cents for expenses, including 5 cents for retailers; and 30 cents for the state. The state's 30 cents will be divided among three programs: prisons will receive 3 cents to help alleviate overcrowding, 9 cents will go to reappraisal and 18 cents will help economic development.

If the anticipated 18 million tickets are sold for the first game, about $540,000 will be raised for the prison system, more than $1.6 million for reappraisal and more than $3.1 million for economic development. Officials expect to raise about $72 million in gross revenue during the first year. Six games are expected to be played during a year.

Once reappraisal is completed by June 1989, those proceeds will be added to economic development.

"The lottery is not here to lower property taxes. But rather, it is to supplement budgets. It's the gravy on the cream," said Paul Louderman, advertising coordinator for the lottery.

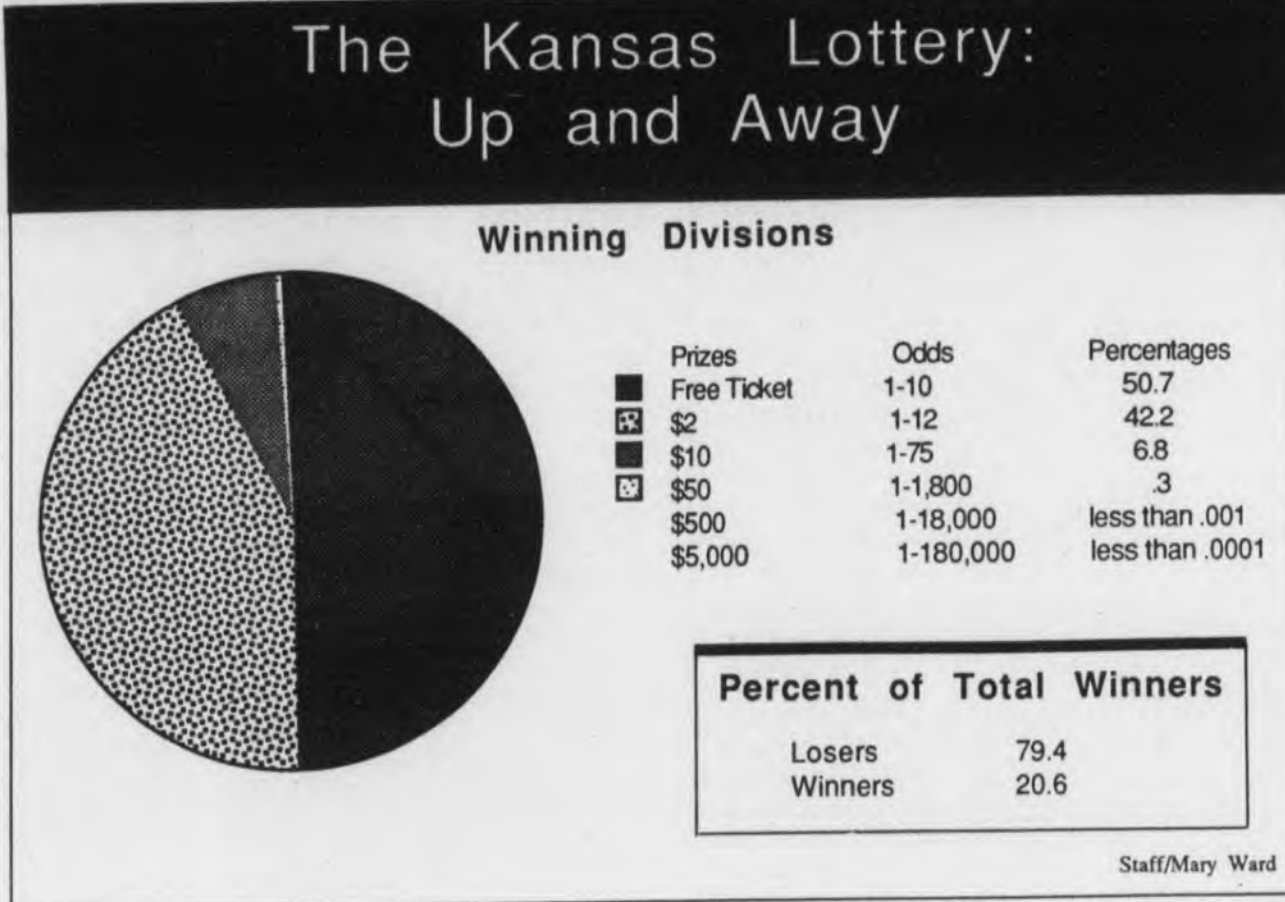

The Department of Commerce will be dispersing the state's portion, he said.

"It can go for a full range of things. It (economic development) is a pretty general term. But it can cover roads, business grants and a variety of other things," Louderman said.

The 9 cents for reappraisal will help counties pay for the statewide land reappraisal that is underway.

Participants can win a free ticket, $2, $10, $50, $500 and $5,000 instantly. Prizes up to $25 must be paid by the retailer, with the larger amounts being paid by the lottery's office in Topeka. Retailers do have the option of paying up to $100 to winners.

Participants can mail five non-winning tickets to the Topeka office where they will be entered in a drawing. Beginning at the end of November, one will be drawn each week.

"By the time we are ready to draw for the $100,000, we should have six to eight people," Louderman said. Those individuals are guaranteed to win $5,000.

In addition to the instant-win game, the computerized, on-line multi-state lottery is expected to begin in February. Six states and the District of Columbia will participate in Lotto America. Participating states include Iowa, Missouri, Oregon, Rhode Island, West Virginia and Kansas.

Contestants will choose seven numbers from a field of 40 and the winning numbers will be drawn weekly.

"The prizes in the multi-state lottery will be bigger than what we can award in the Kansas Lottery," Louderman said. "They can get as big as $3 million to $10 million."

A starting date for the Kansas on-line game has not been set, but a decision is expected to be made within the next three weeks.

The Lottery Commission has signed a contract with CBS to have a 30-minute, live show each week. Seven stations will broadcast the drawing, including KCTV, Channel 5, in Kansas City, Mo.; KWCH, Channel 12, in Wichita; WIBW, Channel 13, in Topeka; KTVC, Channel 6, in Ensign-Dodge City; KOAM, Channel 7, in Pittsburg; KAYS, Channel 7, in Hays; and KLOE, Channel 10, in Goodland.

"After Ohio did something like this, their ticket sales increased 200 percent," Louderman said.

The show will also be a promotional tool for the state, he said. Where the money from lottery ticket sales is going and what it is being used for will be discussed during the broadcast.

"It (the show) is at no cost to us. CBS will get six minutes of advertising time and will do the promotion, programming and give us the air time," Louderman said.

In addition to the show, Louderman said the state on-line game will be started quicker than it has started in other states.

"It will provide two types of games that can be played and a lot of chances to win," said Nancy Zogleman, director of public information for the lottery.

The lottery was approved by 64 percent of the voters in 1986. Of the state's 105 counties, a majority of the voters in 90 counties approved the proposal of a state-run lottery.

The bill that was approved the next year by the Kansas Legislature had seven major points. The bill:

- created a state agency, the Kansas Lottery, to run the games;
- established a five-member commission to regulate and advise the agency with the authority to approve and enter into contracts;
- created the position of executive director to oversee the day-to-day operations;
- reaffirmed the allotment of revenue;
- exempted lottery tickets from sales tax;
- allowed liquor stores to sell tickets;
- and required prizes of $5,000 or more to be reduced if the winner owes the state money, by the amount the winner owes.

State lotteries have been started in 27 states and the District of Columbia.

Unlike Missouri's lottery advertising, Kansas' lottery advertising will not be required to have the disclaimer about inducing a person to play.

"We are very happy with what the Legislature has set up. They were very progressive," Zogleman said. "They have set up tight security restrictions on employees to ensure their high integrity."

Besides tight security screening of all employees, the tickets have several security features. They include an intricate, engraved design; special identifying marks; micro-printing; traceable numbers; and uniquely formulated security inks with hard-to-match colors and energy reactive properties.

The Legislature's bill requires the lottery be reaffirmed in the 1990 legislative session before the bill expires June 30.

Expirations cause trade, price swings

Commentary

STEPHEN P. HARRISON
Guest
Columnist

It is early afternoon on the third Friday of the final month of each quarter, when stock index options, individual stock options and futures — the "three witches of Wall Street" — expire simultaneously. During the final hour of trading on that day, this "triple witching hour" often results in violent price swings and heavy trading.

The unknowing investor venturing into the market during this expiration hour could suffer, but since the expiration day phenomenon occurs at a predictable time, being aware of it gives investors an opportunity to stay away.

Before explaining what happens during the triple witching hour, we need to define futures and options. A futures contract is an obligation to buy a certain commodity at a set price by a specified future date. An option is the right, but not the obligation, to buy or sell a commodity at a set price by a specified future date.

Options and futures are often referred to as derivative products because they are one step away from the underlying securities to which they relate. In other words, their prices are based on other financial instruments.

A call option gives its buyer the right to buy a certain number of shares of stock at a fixed price before a specified date in the future. A put option gives its buyer the right to sell a certain number of shares of stock at a fixed price within a specified time period.

Many of these options and futures have evolved in the last several years, and some trade in remarkable volume. There are five basic stock indexes trading on various exchanges: the Standard & Poor's 500, the Standard & Poor's 100, the "Value Line" Index, the New York Stock Exchange Composite and the Major Market Index.

The expiration of options and futures causes such a flurry of trading because of arbitrage, the practice of buying currency, commercial bills or securities in one market and selling them at the same time in another to make a profit on the price difference.

The value of index-based products is determined by stock prices at the close of these expiration days, so traders place "market-on-close" orders to buy or sell substantial blocks of stocks included in the popular indexes. The result of so many strategists all running in the same direction is that stock prices can plummet or skyrocket.

There are generally five groups of investors who use these derivative products: large institutions, large brokerage firms, corporations, traders on the floors of the major exchanges and traders who are not on the floor.

In addition to all these people trading at once, the market volatility on the expiration days has been intensified by the use of program trading. Program traders trade in stock index futures, options and the underlying stocks. That way, they have a chance for arbitrage because of the discrepancies between the price of the futures and the shares themselves.

For example, if the S&P 500 index is at 230 while the futures index is at 232, then the investor would sell the futures contract and buy the underlying shares. This would give him a risk-free profit of two.

Though many may never fully understand the three witches and their mystique, the simple warning is to stay away from the triple witching hour unless you want to become spellbound by the frenzy it causes.

Retailers expect indirect profit increase

By Nancy Hill
Collegian Reporter

When the sale of Kansas lottery tickets begins at noon Nov. 12, more than 30 businesses will begin selling tickets to area residents.

Although the retailers expect little profit directly from the sales, they believe the lottery will indirectly benefit their businesses.

"I anticipate that it will improve traffic into the store," said Don Carrel, owner of Kitchens Plus and the Croissant Cafe. "Businesses don't make enough on the tickets alone to supplement the effort, but it's business motivating and brings people in the door."

Also, a winner is likely to spend part of his or her winnings at the store where the ticket was purchased, he said.

The retailers will be required to pay on-the-spot winners for prizes up to $25. However, retailers also have the option to pay $50 and $100 winners. Amounts more than $25 that are not paid by the retailer must be claimed from the lottery's office in Topeka. Claim forms will be available at the outlets.

Dave Orman, office manager of the seven Shop Quik stores in the area, said he also believed the lottery would increase traffic into the convenience shops.

"It's not that we're going to make a lot of money off of the lottery, but if a competitor has it, you have to have it," Orman said. "When a lottery begins, people go gangbusters the first few weeks."

In order to be selected to dispense lottery tickets, retailers completed an application that included questions about credit history, tax payment records and any criminal records. Any retailer in Kansas may sell the tickets provided that selling the tickets is not their sole activity.

A contract for the first location costs $100, with additional locations costing $75.

"A lot of businesses would not have gone to the effort (of filling out the paperwork)," Carrel said. "Even when selected, the 5 cents a retailer makes for each ticket sold probably doesn't cover the increased costs involved with the staff and the bookkeeping."

The ticket distributors will be supplied with promotional items and statewide advertising for the lottery. Carrel said it will be interesting to experiment with these ideas.

"I have to sell the tickets for exactly $1 — no more, no less. But, I can give away as many as I want as a promotion, such as one free lottery ticket with every $10 purchase," he said.

All winning tickets must be redeemed at the store of the initial purchase.

Orman said he can see a problem arising because of the seven different Shop Quik stores in the community.

"Each ticket will have our name and address, and the ticket will only be valid if returned to that particular store," he said.

The first game, Up and Away, will be an instant-win game. Prizes in the amounts of $2, $5, $10, $100, $5,000 and $10,000 will be awarded. Non-winning tickets can be sent in groups of five to the state office where they will be entered in a $100,000 statewide drawing at the end of the game.

Ginsburg's cable stock holdings to be investigated by Democrats

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan stood by his Supreme Court nominee Monday as Senate Democrats said they would investigate Douglas H. Ginsburg's having held stock in a cable TV company while supervising a government effort to win First Amendment protection for cable television operators.

Meanwhile, conservative groups said they were not concerned about reports that Ginsburg's wife, Dr. Hallee Perkins Morgan, performed two abortions and assisted in a third as a medical resident in Boston in 1979-80. One conservative spokesman said she should be commended for making a personal decision to stop participating in such procedures.

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will conduct hearings on Ginsburg's nomination, cautioned senators not to jump to conclusions about a possible conflict of interest in the cable television matter. But they also made clear they believe the issue should be investigated.

Several expressed concern that the committee did not discover the issue a year ago during hearings on Ginsburg's nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals here.

Financial disclosure statements indicate that at the time of the cable court case, Ginsburg had a stake of almost $140,000 in Rogers Communications Inc. The Supreme Court embraced the administration's friend-of-the-court brief, which Ginsburg had helped prepare as a Justice Department official, in a 1986 decision likely to reduce government regulation of cable operators.

The issue "has to be pursued," said Sen. Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., often a swing vote on the Judiciary Committee. He urged senators not to "rush to judgment in concluding he can't serve or dismiss it as another red herring."

"Those who are for Ginsburg will holler and scream 'lynch mob,' but this is what the process should be. Is this enough for one senator to vote 'no' or is it not enough? We don't know the facts yet," DeConcini said.

Reagan, asked by reporters whether he felt he had been given enough information about Ginsburg prior to last Thursday's nomination, said he had thoroughly reviewed the major candidates.

"I'm satisfied with the appointment," Reagan said when questioned briefly during a tour of FBI headquarters with the new FBI director, William Sessions.

When asked whether he was concerned about reports of Ginsburg's cable investments, Reagan said, "No, not at all."

At the White House, presidential spokesman Martin Fitzwater said staff attorneys had reviewed Ginsburg's involvement and determined "it's not a problem."

Fitzwater said, "We do not believe it is a conflict of interest or the appearance of a conflict of interest." He said he did not know if the White House was aware of the situation before Ginsburg was nominated but that "it doesn't make a difference to us because there's no conflict and no appearance of conflict. It's an irrelevant question."

The cable issue was reported over the weekend by The Associated Press.

An administration official close to Ginsburg said Sunday that Ginsburg did not discuss the possibility of a conflict of interest in the cable case with his superiors in the Justice Department or with ethics officers.

Dan Casey, of the American Conservative Union, called news accounts of the cable issue "ridiculous."

"Next, we're going to find out he has parking tickets from 1975 that are unpaid," he said. "There were no laws broken. The company he owns stock in was not affected by the decision, and was not party to the decision."

Peter Smith, spokesman for Judiciary Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., said, "We will review it as part of our investigation on the nomination."

Jobs

In the Lawrence area, unemployment fell from 3.4 percent in August to 3 percent in September. In September of last year, the jobless rate in that city was 3.3 percent.

During the month, the most significant employment growth in Lawrence has been in state and local schools, accompanied by smaller increases in the trade and service industries.

The unemployment rate in Wichita dropped from 4.3 percent in August to 4.1 percent in September. Last year at this time, the Wichita jobless rate was 5.7 percent.

Industries in Wichita reporting employment gains over the month were trade, services and government, mostly state and local schools, according to Taylor. Industries reporting job losses since August were construction, finance, insurance and real estate.

The report says that during the year, all industries in Wichita reported employment growth.

In the Topeka area, the unemployment rate was down from 4.2 percent in August to 4.1 percent in September. The unemployment rate for the capital city last year at this time was 4.8 percent.

Over the past month, employment gains were reported by government, trade and services industries. Transportation and public utilities, however, reported a slight loss of jobs.

Industries in Topeka gaining jobs over the year include trade, finance and real estate and services. Industries which lost jobs since the start of the year include transportation, public utilities, construction and government, the report says.

The highest unemployment rate for the state was Wyandotte County at 7.4 percent, although the jobless rate there dropped from 7.9 percent in August.

The Kansas City metropolitan area is in a different statistical area than that reported by the state.

Neosho County, which in most months during the past year had the highest unemployment rate, was second behind Wyandotte County at 6.7 percent. In August it was at 7.8 percent.

Lowest county rates include Republic County, 1.4 percent; Ness, 1.8; Smith, 1.9; and Kiowa 2.1.

Among the 10 largest counties, the jobless rates for September, as reported by Human Resources, are:

Sedgwick, 4 percent; Johnson, 2.8; Wyandotte, 7.9; Shawnee 4.1; Douglas, 3; Reno, 4.7; Leavenworth, 3.9; Saline, 4.5; and Butler, 4.3.

Resign

Weinberger at the Pentagon, has been national security adviser since December 1986.

He was named to the post in the wake of the Iran-Contra affair, when National Security Adviser John Poindexter resigned under fire.

Neither Weinberger nor Carlucci would comment on their reported moves, and the White House did not dispute the reports.

Weinberger is an old friend of Reagan from California, and his departure from the Cabinet is another in a series of changes as the president moves into his final year in office.

Labor Secretary William Brock and Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole have resigned in recent weeks to work for the presidential campaign of Dole's husband, Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole.

Weinberger, while presiding over the Pentagon buildup, clashed occasionally with Senate Republican leaders, who sought savings in Pentagon spending several years ago. But Reagan usually backed his Cabinet secretary.

Although Weinberger has been a loyal Cabinet officer, he disagreed strongly with Reagan's decision to sell arms to Iran in hopes of winning the release of American hostages held in Lebanon.

He later testified publicly at the congressional Iran-Contra hearings about his opposition.

NBC Nightly News, quoting top administration and congressional sources, said Weinberger's wife Jane is known to be seriously ill.

Asked at a NATO planning meeting in Monterey, Calif., about the broadcast reports, Weinberger replied, "No comment."

The defense secretary previously has denied recent news reports that he planned to resign.

Carlucci, appearing in New York at a meeting of the Council on Foreign Relations, also replied, "no comment" when asked about the reports.

There was also silence at the White House.

disclosure last week of a top-level fight over the pace of "perestroika," Gorbachev's program aimed at improving the quality of life by streamlining bureaucracy, encouraging individual initiative and boosting production of consumer goods.

In a mention of his visit to Washington next month for his third summit with President Reagan, Gorbachev pledged to seek a "palpable breakthrough" leading to reductions in long-range nuclear weapons and a ban on weapons in space.

Signing a treaty to ban intermediate-range nuclear missiles "is very important in itself," he said in his first public comment on the matter since the announcement Friday that he would meet Reagan on Dec. 7 and plan for a return visit by the president.

Agreement to scrap the weapons, he said, "was largely settled back in Reykjavik." That summit collapsed over the issue of Reagan's project for a space-based defense against nuclear attack.

"The world expects the third and fourth Soviet-U.S. summits to produce more than merely an official acknowledgment of the decision agreed upon a year ago, and more than merely continuation of the discussion," the 56-year-old Communist Party chief told an audience of Soviet leaders and international socialist figures.

"That is why we will work unrelentingly at these meetings for a palpable breakthrough, for concrete results in reducing strategic offensive armaments and barring weapons from outer space — the key to removing the nuclear threat."

Criticism of Gorbachev's reform program has come from both sides of the party.

Published reports, confirmed in part by the party, said Moscow party boss Boris N. Yeltsin was frustrated by the slow pace and internal resistance to change, and tendered his resignation at an Oct. 21 meeting of the Central Committee.

Yeltsin, 56, is a non-voting member of the ruling Politburo and one of the new faces in Gorbachev's 2½-year-old government. He has been among the most outspoken advocates of reform.

His speech was said to have drawn a rebuke from Yegor K. Ligachev, who is No. 2 in the 13-member Politburo and a conservative force in the leadership.

Gorbachev said Monday, in apparent reference to the split: "It would be a mistake to take no notice of a certain increase in the resistance of the conservative forces that see perestroika simply as a threat to their selfish interests and objectives.

"Nor can one really doubt that the conservative forces will seize upon any difficulty in a bid to discredit perestroika and provoke dissatisfaction among the people."

He acknowledged there will be some mistakes, but added: "The consequences of marking time, of stagnation and indifference have a much greater impact and cost a lot more than the side effects that arise temporarily in the course of a creative effort to reshape the social fabric."

Without identifying his targets, Gorbachev said: "We should learn to spot, expose and neutralize the maneuvers of the opponents of perestroika, those who act to impede our advance and trip us up, who gloat over our difficulties and setbacks, who try to drag us back into the past."

The Kremlin leader added, in a remark interpreted as scolding Yeltsin: "Nor should we succumb to the pressure of the overly zealous and impatient. It should be clear that one cannot leap over essential stages and try to accomplish everything at one go.

"Perestroika carries on the revolutionary cause."

Big Eight looks strong from top to bottom

Editor's note: This overall conference preview is the first of a series of articles previewing the 1987-88 Big Eight Conference basketball season.

By Staff and Wire Reports

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — With three Big Eight Conference teams ranked in the top 20 in various preseason polls, this could be a golden year for Big Eight basketball.

The University of Missouri, the preseason conference pick, has been ranked as high as No. 5 in "Inside Sports." The University of Kansas was picked by "College Yearbook" as the national preseason favorite. The University of Oklahoma was ranked 10th in the "Sporting News" preseason poll.

After sending five teams into postseason competition for the third consecutive year last season, and with most of the teams more optimistic this year than last, the Big Eight could be in the best position it's ever been.

"The league, in my opinion, is the best it's ever been from top to bottom," University of Nebraska Coach Danny Nee said. "It's the year of the superstar in the Big Eight. There are five people who will be playing in the NBA next year. Probably five first-round draft choices."

Missouri returns 12 of 13 players from last year's conference championship team and are rightfully the favorite in this year's race. But every conference coach, including Missouri's Norm Stewart, agreed Sunday at the Big Eight's basketball media day that it's a wide-open race.

Any team with a performer like Kansas' Danny Manning must be considered a threat. A two-time Big Eight player of the year, the 6-foot-10 senior all-American is a strong candidate for national player-of-the-year honors.

And it's hard to overlook Oklahoma, with a 187-74 record during the 1980s that tops every other program in the league. Iowa State University's returning starters include senior forward Jeff Grayer, a 6-foot-5 senior forward and two-time all-conference selection who shoots, rebounds and defends about as well as anybody else in the country.

K-State, coming off an NCAA Tournament appearance, returns the league's sixth-leading scorer in Mitch Richmond and will be riding an emotional high if K-State Coach Lon Kruger gets his way, because this season will close the doors at historic Ahearn Field House. Kruger intends to keep reminding his players of the proud tradition of the 37-year-old structure.

"It's a special year for us," Kruger said. "We want to leave Ahearn with the proper farewell. It's time to move on. The new building is going to be a very good basketball arena. But I think the students recognize this is something special, a part of history. Ahearn has housed some of the best crowds anywhere. Certainly, we'd like to line up and play well every night, to leave there feeling like we have represented Ahearn well."

Winning at home may be a must in the conference race again this year, with the team that wins on the road possibly becoming the champion.

"I just think the league from top to bottom will be good," Iowa State Coach Johnny Orr said. "We're hoping we can be in there somewhere in the first division. It's just a matter of whether we can win on the road."

"Missouri's got to be the favorite because they won it last year," Orr said. "But they won a lot of close games. A lot of close games. They're going to have to fight their hearts out to repeat."

No matter which team wins the conference, the odds appear to be good that the Big Eight will be well represented in postseason play in both the quality and the quantity of teams.

"I can see us getting seven teams in the NCAA Tournament and the NIT," Kansas Coach Larry Brown said. "I think the conference is going to be great, and it's exciting to be a part of that."

It's even more exciting for Brown, as Manning is entering his final season in a Jayhawk jersey. And he is looking better than ever, if that's possible.

"Danny is the most improved player on our team," Brown said. "He's stronger, physically. He's just a better all-around player. We've had a lot of pro scouts at our practices the last week. The common statement they all make to me is that he practices harder than anybody, goes through every drill dedicated to getting better. I think that's the reason he's improved so much."

"I think Danny is the premier player in the country," Nee said. "And you may not hear as much about the Richmonds and the Grayers, but those guys are very, very good basketball players. The young man at Oklahoma, Harvey Grant, is a terrific player. Missouri's Derrick Chievous is a super player. In addition, we've got a lot of returning veterans to complement those superstars."

Colorado Coach Tom Miller pointed out the Big Eight had two teams reach the final 16 of last year's NCAA Tournament.

"You have to think the Big Eight is right up there. Last year I said it was one of the top 3-4 conferences in the country," Miller said. "When you line up head-to-head and look at the won-loss records, you've got to say it's about as good as anybody."

"Danny Nee's Nebraska team last year is a good example," Miller said. "They were 7-7 in the conference and then go to the final four of the NIT. I don't think you can take the Big Eight for granted anymore."

"I see four teams that could legitimately say...they have a shot at winning it," Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs said. "Whoever can win against those teams will be the team that will win it. Who are the four? I don't even know who the other three are. It will be a hell of a race. There's no question about it."

Chievous, Missouri's 6-foot-7 senior forward is on line to become Missouri's first 2,000-point scorer.

"Chievous has a great knack of getting the ball in the hoop, getting fouled and making the foul shot," Stewart said. "But he's also a tremendous rebounder. Derrick is 20 years old. A fun guy. He kind of brings you back to the reality of it. Who cares if $200 million is coming in? All of a sudden, it's back to the game, guys. Just play, and have fun. That's what the kids like to do."

Lurking on the horizon is another reason that could make this a special year for Big Eight basketball. Kansas City's Kemper Arena will host the Big Eight's postseason tournament in March and then, April 2-4, Kemper will stage the Final Four.

"Wouldn't it be great," Stewart said, "to have the Big Eight Tournament there, and then have four league teams come back to Kemper? At least, it would be great if we were one of the four."

Ruggers win two, drop one

By Russ Ewy
Sports Writer

The K-State rugby squad split two games with Wichita before beating Garden City last Saturday in Wichita.

The A-side scored a much-needed victory when they defeated Wichita, 22-3, in the first game of the weekend.

"In the first A-side game, I thought that we played a good game," Head Coach Dan Blea said. "I think that we would have done better if we had better hands. We had a little trouble this weekend holding onto the ball, but aside from that, we had some guys that played a real fine game."

K-State lost the only game of the day when the B-side yielded to a more experienced side, according to Blea.

"In the second (B-side) game we weren't quite as lucky. We sent out what we thought was going to be a really good side, and it was, but the fact of the matter was Wichita put out a side that was really experienced. They were a good club side," Blea said.

"They had guys that had been playing 15 to 20 years and they ended up beating us 20-0 that game. Even though it was a loss, it was probably the best that the B-side has played all season. Those guys are finally starting to get as a team and it's starting to come together a little better."

Even with the loss, Blea was pleased with the performance of the team.

"It's hard to get positive things out of losses, but with the types of teams that they are playing, and the fact that Wichita had many more experienced players, we still played pretty tough," Blea said.

Blea also sees his club playing better as a team — a welcomed sign going into the final two games of the regular season against some quality clubs.

Volleyball team looks to avenge loss by beating No. 7-ranked NU

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

K-State's volleyball team will have its hands full when the Wildcats host nationally ranked Nebraska at 7:30 p.m. today at Ahearn Field House.

The Cornhuskers, ranked No. 7 by the American Volleyball Coaches Association, bring a sparkling 23-1 overall mark and a perfect 10-0 Big Eight Conference record into the match. In 11 years of Big Eight volleyball, Nebraska has won the championship every year.

"Obviously Nebraska has a great team," K-State Coach Scott Nelson said. "Our goal for the match is to go out and just play as hard and as well as we possibly can. If we accomplish these positives, I think some good things will happen for us."

In the last meeting of the two teams Oct. 13 in Lincoln, the 'Huskers were able to sweep the 'Cats in three games. Nebraska hasn't lost a match in conference play this year and has only lost two Big Eight matches in the last 10 years.

K-State, 17-7 overall and 5-4 in the conference, will be led by two team members who are among the nation's elite in volleyball statistics. Kristi Jacquart ranks seventh nationally in aces with 0.86 per game and outside hitter Shawnee Call ranks 13th in digs with 3.90 and 16th in kills per game with 4.44.

As a team, the 'Cats are 10th in the nation in aces, averaging 3.09 aces per contest.

Nelson said his squad had not been playing with the intensity it needed earlier in the season, but is now playing much better volleyball after winning The Wichita State University Invitational last weekend.

"Our level of intensity and our level of play hasn't been where we wanted as a team," Nelson said. "We have been showing improvement lately with each match. I wish we had a couple more matches to fine tune it before we face a tough team like Nebraska."

"We are much improved since the last time (we faced Nebraska)," he added. "We have been improving on things that we control and not worrying about the things that we can't control. We just want to play tough."

I'll take crew team for $100, Alex'

Tom on Tuesday

TOM MORRIS
Sports Writer

We pick up today's Jeopardy match near the end of the first round with Jack leading with $3,700. Matt trails Jack by $1,500 and Rose Ann is in a distant third at $900.

Alex Trebek: "Contestants, we have only one category remaining with less than a minute to go. Jack, you have control of the board."

Jack: "I'll take Kansas State University for 100, Alex."

Trebek: "The answer is: One athletic program which is rapidly improving but is known as an 'orphan' sport. Rose Ann?"

Rose Ann: "What is the football team?"

Trebek: "Sorry, Rose Ann, but it was a nice try. Maybe you'll get your act together in Double Jeopardy. Jack?"

Jack: "What is the K-State crew?"

Trebek: "Correct. And you have a big lead going into the second round."

K-State's rowing team is celebrating its 25th anniversary season. Dear Abby or Ann Landers would suggest a gift of something silver. Coach Don Rose, though, would like to see some green in the form of financial backing from the University.

"In the past we've resisted any efforts from the University to help us out because we felt if we took a few hundred dollars, we wouldn't have control of our own destiny," Rose said.

But time, and the fact that other crews are receiving school funding, has changed Rose's views on this issue.

"Kansas University's crew receives $50,000, Wichita State gets $32,000, Washburn receives $1,700 and K-State gets a goose egg," he said. "After a quarter century here, we need to get something."

Rose said athletic department officials have scoffed at the idea because crews are not recognized as a Big Eight Conference sport. He added that numerous reports which said it was in the University's best interest to finance the crew were "pigeonholed" by past administrators.

People, it's time to wake up and smell the coffee. There is life after football and men's basketball.

After going from not fielding an eight-man crew to placing eighth, sixth and fourth the last three years at the Midwest Regionals, respectively, K-State's crew has nowhere to go but up.

Though Rose would like to see funding established on a permanent basis, helping finance the crew's trip this summer to Henley, England, for the Henley Championships would be a start.

And let's not stop with the crew. Let's include other club sports such as soccer and rugby. When the Collegian ran its fall sports supplement, some athletic department officials were reportedly upset because we ran club sports in it.

With the election of new student senators, it's the perfect time to initiate a campaign to fund club sports. Just my voice alone won't do it; it will take several people before we're heard.

Besides, the crew won't ask for millions of dollars to build a Fred Bramlage Lake.

Craig honored as AP manager of the year

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Roger Craig, whose skill and inspiration lifted the San Francisco Giants from last place to a division championship, was named Monday as The Associated Press Manager of the Year.

Craig received 46 votes from a nationwide poll of writers and broadcasters prior to postseason play, one more than Montreal's Buck Rodgers.

Tom Kelly, manager of the World Series champion Minnesota Twins, was third with 37 votes. Whitey Herzog, who led St. Louis to the National League pennant, was fourth with 20 votes followed by Detroit's Sparky Anderson (17), Milwaukee's Tom Trebelhorn (5) and Pittsburgh's Jim Leyland (1).

The Giants finished the season 90-72, six games ahead of Cincinnati in the NL West.

San Francisco took a 3-2 lead in its best-of-seven playoff with the Cardinals, but were shut out in the final two games at St. Louis.

"We had a great season," Craig said. "It was tough on everyone losing to St. Louis, but it was an outstanding season, and losing one or two games doesn't ruin that. Like Whitey Herzog said, the toughest part is getting there, making it to the playoffs."

Craig was named the Giants' skipper on Sept. 18, 1985, by general manager Al Rosen. The Giants were 56-88 under Jim Davenport to that point, and finished the season 62-100. It was the first time in the franchise's history that the Giants had lost 100 games.

"I was only there 18 games (in 1985) and didn't really learn much about the players then," Craig said. "Half of them were hurt and the other half wanted to go home. They were already talking about going hunting."

Craig used his experience as a player, coach and scout to make sure the Giants hunted for victories the following season.

"In spring training of 1986, I realized we had some pretty good players on the club," Craig said. "It wasn't a team that was going to lose 100 games. At the All-Star break when we went into first place, the players were believing they could win. I'd been saying it all along, but maybe they didn't really believe me until then."

The Giants finished 1986 at 83-79, third in the West, and were only the ninth team in major-league history to have a winning record following a 100-loss season.

The team slumped to 22-31 for May and June and fell 5½ games behind in third following a four-game losing streak that ended Aug. 5. Then, while Cincinnati and Houston faded down the stretch, San Francisco reeled off 29 victories in 40 games.

"Whether we win or lose four games in a row, he's always the same," second baseman Robby Thompson said. "If we lose four in a row now, everybody knows 'Don't get your dauber down.'"

That's one of Craig's pet expressions along with "Humm Baby," sandlot chatter which the manager uses to denote hard-nosed play and has adopted as the team's unofficial slogan.

As a starting pitcher for Brooklyn, he recorded a World Series victory as a rookie in 1955 and picked up championship rings that year and in 1959.

3-year-old survives transplant surgery

Girl third to receive 5 organs

By The Associated Press
PITTSBURGH — A 3-year-old girl was awake and kicking with her favorite doll beside her Monday as doctors watched for any signs of rejection after she became only the third person in the nation to receive a five-organ transplant. Tabatha Foster of Madisonville, Ky., remained in critical condition, which is normal after transplant surgery, at Children's Hospital of Pittsburgh, said hospital spokeswoman Lynn McMahon. "Tabatha's moving. She's kicking," said her mother, Sandra Foster. "She's opened her eyes and she's responding to her dad and I. When we say, 'Tabatha, wiggle your toes,' she'll wiggle her toes." Transplant pioneer Dr. Thomas Starzl said Tabatha was wide awake but could not talk because she was breathing with a respirator, which may be removed Tuesday. She was sedated enough to make her comfortable, and her arms were restrained. "She's great right now," Starzl said. "Her lungs are fine. Her kidneys are functioning well. Her cardiovascular system is normal. This is more or less what we were hoping for." Surgeons transplanted a liver, pancreas, small intestine and parts of the stomach and colon during an operation that ended Sunday after nearly 15 hours. The organs came from 2-month-old Heather Orick, who died after a car accident. "Part of her is living," said her father, Earl Shirks, 42, of Pennington Gap, Va. Sandra Foster said she told Tabatha about the surgery she would undergo. "I told her, 'Tab, this is your last surgery, and you will get well and come home with Mommy and Daddy,'" she said. "It's pretty hard to say she really understands what's happening, but Tabatha's just a happy, delightful kid even though she's been in the hospital all her life." Sandra Foster said she and her husband, Roy, had medical insurance but it would cover only costs up to the transplant, not follow-up care.

They have no other children. Tabatha could become the first survivor among three U.S. recipients of such transplants since 1983. "Who knows, maybe she'll go down in history," Sandra Foster said before the operation. The other two patients were not as healthy as Tabatha, Starzl said. Doctors removed Tabatha's spleen, which filters blood and can trigger rejection of new organs. They were watching her closely for any signs that her body's natural defenses are attacking the foreign tissue. Tabatha suffered from short gut syndrome, a deadly congenital deformity in which twisted intestines block the flow of blood. The condition was relieved when she was 2 days old by surgical removal of her lower intestine, but that left her unable to eat solid food, and her liquid diet caused her liver to fail. Although she needed only a liver-intestine transplant, doctors said it was easier to transplant the larger five-organ grouping. Foster works for Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. and his wife works for General Electric Co., both in Madisonville.

4-day conference to aid rural families

By Cindie Baldwin
Collegian Reporter
Topics such as rural youth concerns, family financial decision-making and rural assistance will be discussed during the seventh annual Working with Families Conference to focus on helping rural families. The conference, meeting in the Union today through Thursday, is designed to provide skills and knowledge useful to professionals and persons who work with rural families. "More than 50 professionals from throughout the United States will present workshops and presentations at this nationally recognized conference," said Steve Bollman, Family Center Director at K-State. Keynote speakers will include Joan Aldous, junior professor of Sociology at the University of Notre Dame. Aldous is recognized as a well-known family lecturer, researcher and the immediate past president of the National Council on Family Relations. Other speakers will be William and Judith Heffernan, rural sociologists in the department of Rural Sociology at the University of Missouri. They are nationally

Stock prices show slight increase

By The Associated Press
NEW YORK — Stock prices rose slightly Monday in the calmest trading since the crash two weeks ago, giving Wall Street the appearance of normality despite the potential threat of a sharply weaker dollar. The Dow Jones average of 30 industrial stocks, which tumbled a record 508 points Oct. 19 and 156.83 points Oct. 26, traded within a relatively narrow range on this Monday. The indicator quickly recovered from a 26 point deficit and closed up 20.56 at 2,014.09. It was the fifth straight session that the nation's best-known stock measure ended with a gain. Broader market indices also rose Monday.

"This is quite different from the last two Mondays for sure. We have stabilized," said Ronald B. Doran, head of institutional trading at First Albany Corp. "The fear and trembling is basically not prevalent." Volume on the New York Stock Exchange totaled a relatively moderate 176.04 million shares, the first time volume was less than 200 million since the collapse. It was the lowest volume since Oct. 13, when 172.87 million shares were traded. Gaining stocks outnumbered losers by more than 5 to 3 in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, where 1,093 issues rose in price, 629 declined and 289 remained unchanged. The most prominent gainers were led by takeover-related stocks. Santa Fe Southern Pacific rose 4 1/2 to 55 after Henley Group said it was negotiating to acquire the railroad company for $63 a share. Singer rose 3/4 to 47 1/2 after investor Paul Bilzerian offered $50 a share for the electronics concern. Among actively traded issues comprising the Dow Jones industrial, IBM gained 1 1/2 to 124 1/2, Du Pont rose 3 to 93 1/2, Exxon advanced 1 to 43 1/2 and Eastman Kodak rose 1 to 56 1/2. Union Carbide was the NYSE's most active stock, up 1/2 to 22 with more than 7.61 million shares traded. There were reports that the chemical company might be nearing a settlement in the 1984 plant disaster that killed about 2,500 people in Bhopal, India. The NYSE composite index measuring all listed issues rose 1.94 to 142.74. Standard & Poor's index of 400 industrials rose 4.48 to 293.03, and S&P's 500-stock composite index rose 3.96 to 255.75. The Wilshire Associates 5,000 Equity Index, the market value of 5,000 NYSE, American and over-the-counter issues, totaled $2.48 trillion, up $37.46 billion from Friday. At the American Stock Exchange, the market value index rose 1.37 to 261.73. The NASDAQ composite index for the over-the-counter market closed at 328.33, up 5.03.

known specialists on the impact of farm loss and rural economic trouble on families.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean in the College of Human Ecology at K-State, will be on a panel discussion speaking about family relationships and the changes that occur through economic or personal stress.

Moxley agreed to be on the panel because of her knowledge about marriage and parent-child relationships.

"I have kept up on what happens to the family as community structures change," Moxley said.

"There are several changes that affect the structure of the family," she said. "Of course there is economic change, but another important change is (that) as the population of the rural communities get smaller, opportunities are constrained and friendships are limited, making changes in how a person feels about himself."

Moxley said the conference is necessary because "it will create awareness about the things that make it difficult on the quality of life and what can be done about it."

"I am confident the panel discussion will be beneficial to those who attend," she said.

Along with the discussions and workshops, there will be a resource fair exhibiting some of the assistance resources and programs available to rural families and communities.

Films will also be shown on selected rural topics.

Falwell: Bakkers to return

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Although he hopes it won't happen, Jim and Tammy Bakker probably will be allowed by the courts to return to their troubled PTL ministry in one or two years, the Rev. Jerry Falwell said.

Falwell also predicted Monday that the PTL property, including the Heritage U.S.A. resort in Fort Mill, S.C., would be sold and that Bakker and his partners would be allowed to buy it back at a fraction of the cost.

Falwell resigned recently as chairman of PTL after taking over the ministry in March following a sex scandal involving Jim Bakker and a church secretary.

U.S. productivity jumps 2.6 percent

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Led by manufacturers, American businesses and workers increased their productivity 2.6 percent last quarter, the government said Monday, a sign that the United States is continuing to improve its competitive posture in the world economy.

The increased efficiency by the nation's non-farm businesses in churning out goods and services in July, August and September was more than double the improvement over the past year, the Labor Department said.

Productivity among manufacturers jumped 4.5 percent as factories raised their assembly line output by 8.2 percent — the biggest increase since the first quarter of 1984 — while working their employees only 3.5 percent more hours.

That combination, plus the ability of manufacturers to keep wage gains to only 1.4 percent the third quarter, slashed the labor costs for each product coming off an assembly line an average 3 percent, the Labor Department said.

"It's another encouraging sign for the emerging return of a more competitive U.S. economy," said Allen Sinai, chief economist for Shearson Lehman Brothers, a Wall Street brokerage house. "Stronger productivity and lower unit labor costs are the key. Hopefully, it will continue."

Meanwhile, the Commerce Department reported that factory orders rose 1.1 percent in September, the largest gain in three months, and that construction spending jumped 1.5 percent, the sharpest increase since June.

Analysts said the reports Monday by the Labor and Commerce departments underscore the general health of the U.S. economy before the collapse of stock prices on world markets over the past two weeks.

"All this data is B.C. — before the crash," said David Wyss, chief financial economist for Data Resources Inc. of Lexington, Mass. "There's no question now that crash was caused by panic, not by any evidence that the economy was beginning to weaken."

Analysts said the 8.2 percent increase in manufacturing output coupled with a factory employment gain of 110,000 workers in July, August and September both signal continued U.S. economic growth despite the falling stock prices.

While they credit a large part of the recovery to the dollar's 40 percent drop in value against the Japanese yen and other major foreign currencies over the past two years, cost-cutting by U.S. manufacturers also is cited as a major factor.

Despite pay increases generally keeping pace with inflation this year, the 1.4 percent hourly wage gains for manufacturing workers in the third quarter translates into a 2.4 percent drop in buying power after taking inflation into account.

While the lower labor costs foretell a more competitive U.S. economy, they also can bring about a slower growing one.

Voters to decide offices, proposals

By The Associated Press

Democrat Ray Mabus and Republican Jack Reed made the final rounds of their Mississippi gubernatorial campaign on Monday while national party officials debated the significance of scattered off-year elections.

In the other statehouse election on Tuesday's ballot, Democrat Wallace Wilkinson wrapped up his campaign to be Kentucky's governor, heavily favored over Republican state Rep. John Harper.

In a featured municipal contest, a bitter $3.7 million campaign in Philadelphia, Mayor W. Wilson Goode is seeking a second term over opposition from Frank Rizzo, a former Democratic mayor who switched to the GOP in a bid to reclaim his job.

Miami Mayor Xavier Suarez also faces a challenge from a former mayor, Maurice Ferre, who was ousted in 1985.

Mayors Kathy Whitmire in Houston, Ray Flynn in Boston and William Hudnut in Indianapolis are expected to win new terms easily.

Prosecutor Kurt Schmoke is favored to become the first black elected mayor of heavily Democratic Baltimore, and Mayor Dianne Feinstein's departure in San Francisco has resulted in a crowded ballot there.

Voters in several areas will decide the fate of political initiatives, ranging from a proposal to pull the plug on an operating nuclear plant in Maine to a requirement in Washington, D.C., for a deposit on bottles and cans containing carbonated beverages.

In Mississippi, Democrats expressed confidence that Mabus, a 39-year-old state auditor, would keep the statehouse in Democratic hands, as it has been since Reconstruction.

But Republicans said that Reed, 63, was their best hope in several elections to claim the office for the GOP.

In contrast to off-year elections in 1985, the contests in Kentucky and Mississippi have generated relatively few headlines outside those states.

Both parties poured resources into elections in New Jersey and Virginia two years ago. Republicans were able to tout their successes in New Jersey, where a GOP governor was re-elected and the party won control of the state assembly, as evidence of a national political realignment. Democrats cited Virginia, where they elected the three top statewide officials, as an example of their own political comeback.

Paul Kirk, chairman of the Democratic party, said Tuesday's elections will carry little, if any significance nationally.

The 63-year-old Reed stumped as an advocate of change, and sought to portray his opponent as a man who would raise taxes if he got into office. "No Mabus about it," said one television commercial.

Mabus survived a heated primary battle earlier in the year to win his party's nomination. He is a Harvard-educated lawyer who has used his four years as state auditor to oversee investigations that turned up irregularities by county supervisors across the state.

Gov. Bill Allain, a Democrat, declined to seek a new term.

In Kentucky Gov. Martha Layne Collins was barred from seeking a second term, and Wilkinson, a college dropout and millionaire businessman, survived a crowded primary race to claim the Democratic nomination. He has been far ahead in the polls ever since, and until the final weekend of the campaign, regularly urged his audiences to give him the biggest margin of victory in state history.

Harper, 57, is bidding to become the first Republican elected governor in 20 years, but he was able to raise less than $250,000 compared with $4 million by Wilkinson since the primary.

Court considers parental consent in teen abortions

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — States must be allowed to protect the right of parents to consult with their young daughters who seek abortions, the Supreme Court was told Tuesday.

An Illinois law requiring that parents be notified at least 24 hours before teen-age girls abort their pregnancies should be reinstated, state Deputy Attorney General Michael J. Hayes argued.

"The law protects the constitutional right of parents to properly control the upbringing of their children. It protects family structure and protects minors from their own immaturity," he said.

But Colleen Connell, a Chicago lawyer representing doctors who perform abortions, said the law exposes teen-age girls to medical risks in a misguided attempt to promote family unity.

Lower courts have blocked the 1983 law from being enforced.

If the Supreme Court reinstates the law and it serves as a model for other states, abortion could become a less-available alternative for many American teen-agers who become pregnant. The number of such pregnancies now is more than 1 million a year.

The court's decision in the case, the only abortion controversy currently before it, is expected by July.

The Illinois law, enacted by the state General Assembly over Gov. James R. Thompson's veto, required that unmarried girls under 18 and still financially dependent on their parents notify both parents 24 hours before having an abortion.

The law allowed a girl to avoid notifying her parents if she could prove to a state judge she was mature enough and well-informed enough to make the decision on her own and that notifying her parents would not be in her best interest.

Doctors who failed to comply with the law's requirements faced criminal prosecution.

A federal trial judge struck down the law, but the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals did not go that far.

The appeals court ruled that the 24-hour waiting period was an impermissible infringement on the right to have an abortion. But it left to the state Supreme Court the issue of whether the law sufficiently protected the confidentiality and anonymity of girls who appeal when a judge denies permission for an abortion.

Tuesday's market down 50 points

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The fear that gripped the world's stock markets last month cast its shadow again Tuesday, but a late rally in New York spared the Dow Jones industrial average from another frightening loss of more than 100 points.

The Dow average of 30 blue-chip stocks ended the day down 50.56 points after losing as much as 102 points earlier in the afternoon.

Twelve stocks fell in price for every five that gained on the New York Stock Exchange.

The Dow's loss pushed the average back below the 2,000 mark at 1,963.53, ending a string of five consecutive gains. The average had gained more than 220 points over the stretch.

Analysts said the recent runup in the market may have precipitated the decline as investors, still shaken by the record 508-point decline in the Dow industrials on Oct. 19, sold stock to lock in short-term gains.

Tuesday's fall wiped out nearly $48 billion from the value of all U.S. stocks, according to the Wilshire Associates tally. It left the Dow average less than halfway back from its one-day fall on Black Monday.

In foreign trading, the major Hong Kong index fell 1 percent and London's 100-stock index fell 4 percent. There was no trading in Tokyo, the world's largest stock market, because of a national holiday.

A plunge in the dollar to new post-war lows battered stocks early in the day in New York, and although the dollar snapped back later, stocks only partially recovered.

"People are very hopeful that they saw the worst, but the least sign of decline, they sell. I don't blame them, it's human nature," said William LeFevre, a market strategist for Advest Inc.

There were no major news events to account for the stock selloff, although some analysts said investors were concerned by a lack of reports of progress on talks in Washington on reducing the federal budget deficit.

Crash hits students where it hurts most: on their gradecard

By Stacey Schumacher
Collegian Reporter

Losing $70,000 is bad news for anybody who invests in the stock market—even if the money isn't real.

"I didn't believe it really happened. I thought Mr. Sanderson was playing a joke," said Jared Swan, a senior at Manhattan High School.

Several students at MHS lost imaginary money after the stock market dropped more than 500 points Oct. 19. MHS is one of six high schools with a team playing a national stock market game sponsored by the Center for Economic Education in the College of Education.

Bill Sanderson, economics instructor at MHS, said the students were upset when the stock market fell.

"It bothers them a great deal when they lose money," he said. "They were really upset. It was like it was their own money."

A portion of the students' grades are based on whether they lose or make money during the game.

For $10, each team was given an imaginary $100,000 to invest in common stock. Each week, the teams turn in daily or weekly transactions to their instructor. They select stocks on the American and New York stock exchanges and over-the-counter stocks. The events in the game are based on actual stock prices and current events which are processed by a K-State computer.

Phil Dodderidge, senior, is a member of the team that lost $70,000. His team thought the market might drop further, since it had already dropped 100 points at that time. So, team members tried to sell everything early Monday when the market began dropping. But because of the computer card system, the actual selling of the stocks didn't take place until a few days later, he said.

"If we'd been in the real stock market, we'd have got out early and been all right," Dodderidge said.

Matt Schreiner, senior, said that if they want to buy or sell stock on Tuesday, for example, they send the card into the computer. The actual transaction, however, doesn't take place until Friday or the following week.

Schreiner's team lost $20,000 as a

See GAME, Page 10

"We're in a crisis of confidence," said Alan Ackerman, an investment strategist for Gruntal & Co. "We need two cuts: A cut in rhetoric and a cut in the budget deficit and the trade deficit."

The dollar touched new lows Tuesday but then rebounded on speculation that the West German central bank might cut a key interest rate in coordination with a similar move Tuesday by the Dutch central bank.

Lower West German rates would help the dollar's value by making dollar-denominated securities relatively more attractive.

The dollar rose less than 1 percent against the Japanese yen and West German mark after having fallen earlier in the day to its lowest point in 40 years. The dollar bottomed around 1.71 West German marks and was bid in late New York trading at about 1.72 marks. It bottomed at 136.20 Japanese yen and finished the day at 137.50.

The dollar's weakness raises the risk of accelerating inflation in the United States through higher import prices. Higher inflation would push up interest rates and hurt the stock market.

However, investors apparently have decided the stock market collapse weakened the economy enough that inflation is not a serious risk. Bond prices, which are sensitive to inflation and move in the opposite direction of interest rates, have risen strongly since the stock market collapse.

Bond prices rose Tuesday and yields fell. The yield on the benchmark 30-year Treasury bond dipped below the 9 percent level to 8.99 percent from 9.12 percent late Monday.

UAW chief disputes Robertson's claim of workers' drug use

By The Associated Press

LANSING, Mich. — Republican presidential hopeful Pat Robertson said Tuesday that a quarter of America's auto workers use illegal drugs, leading to declining productivity, a remark United Auto Workers President Owen Bieber called "off the wall."

"If the auto workers want jobs, what they have to recognize is that one out of every four people on the assembly line, according to statistics I have, is using drugs...."

—Pat Robertson

Robertson said his candidacy could appeal to blue-collar workers, such as auto workers, in Michigan and across the nation, even though they traditionally have voted Democratic.

"If the auto workers want jobs, what they have to recognize is that one out of every four people on the assembly line, according to statistics I have, is using drugs. That's a 25 percent drop in productivity right there, possibly. So I think the auto workers would appreciate a tough anti-drug program," he said.

Robertson said later he wasn't criticizing auto workers, who a month ago were compared unfavorably to Soviet mechanics by Vice President George Bush.

"I am in no way disparaging anybody. My goodness," the former television evangelist said. "In our society, we consume 60 percent of all the world's illegal drugs and drugs are a problem and they're a problem in the workforce."

"People smoke marijuana. They take cocaine. It's just one of those things. I'm not disparaging auto workers. I'm just saying that in industry in general, that it is estimated by certain sources that about one out of every four workers is using some kind of an illicit substance."

"I think that squares with the national average. About 25 percent of our people take drugs. That's not a disparagement to anybody. It's just a fact. If we took drugs out of the workplace, it would help the other three on the assembly line who don't take drugs. That's all."

Bieber said the comment "shows ignorance of the facts and poor political judgment in equal measure."

"A person aspiring to the presidency shouldn't be tossing around off-the-wall remarks in the area he knows nothing about," Bieber said.

"There is no rampant drug use among autoworkers and workers will certainly not welcome Robertson's 'get tough' position on drugs if it lends support to more so-called 'sweeps' and proposals for mandatory testing."

Final claims filed, lawyer says

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Damage claims have been filed by about 190 people in what may be the final chance for victims of the 1981 Hyatt Regency hotel skywalks collapse to seek compensation for physical or emotional harm.

A legal notice published in September alerted people with remaining potential claims to file them with U.S. District Judge D. Brook Bartlett by Oct. 30.

John C. Aisenbrey, a lawyer for Hallmark Cards Inc. and its subsidiary, Crown Center Redevelopment Corp., owners of the hotel, said Tuesday that about 190 claims were filed. He said about two dozen of the claims have been settled from the $500,000 fund set up recently to satisfy the remaining victims' claims.

People filing claims under the latest procedure include hotel employees, volunteer rescue workers and others who were at the hotel following the July 17, 1981, skywalks collapse that killed 114 people and injured about 200.

Ginsburg under investigation

WASHINGTON — An American Bar Association panel and the government's ethics office said Tuesday they are reviewing Supreme Court nominee Douglas H. Ginsburg's handling of a cable television case while holding investments in a cable firm.

Senators, meanwhile, were still reacting with caution to Ginsburg, saying they know too little about him to make any judgment on his qualifications.

Even Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., refused to commit himself to Ginsburg, saying he wanted "to find out about the cable thing myself."

Dole, a candidate for his party's presidential nomination, added, "I want to hear what they have to say."

Harold R. Tyler Jr. of New York, chairman of the ABA Standing Committee on Federal Judiciary Members, said Ginsburg's cable holdings are "one of the many issues we're already looking into."

Donald E. Campbell, acting director of the Office of Government Ethics, said his staff will "look at all the facts" before discussing Ginsburg's activities while heading the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Parties agree on prediction

WASHINGTON — Senators of both parties predicted Tuesday that Frank C. Carlucci, President Reagan's national security adviser, would be easily confirmed as secretary of defense if nominated as expected to replace Caspar Weinberger.

Weinberger's resignation and Carlucci's selection are likely to be announced later this week, according to administration and congressional sources speaking on condition of anonymity.

Officially, neither the White House nor the Pentagon confirmed the reports, and both Weinberger and Carlucci declined comment.

Sources said Carlucci would be replaced as director of the National Security Council staff by Army Lt. Gen. Colin Powell, who is currently Carlucci's deputy.

Boron may help older women

WASHINGTON — A trace element, boron, may play an important role in preventing osteoporosis, or brittle bones, in older women, an Agriculture Department report said Tuesday.

Forrest H. Nielsen, a nutritionist, and Curtiss D. Hunt, an anatomist, said the results of a six-month study "will generate a lot of interest" in boron's potential role in preventing osteoporosis.

In the study, which they described as the first to look at the nutritional effects of boron in humans, 12 postmenopausal women consumed a very low boron diet of 0.25 milligrams per day for 17 weeks. They were then given a daily supplement of 3 milligrams, representing the boron intake from a well-balanced diet, for seven more weeks.

Within eight days after the supplement was introduced, the women lost 40 percent less calcium, one-third less magnesium and slightly less phosphorous through the urine, the report said. Their calcium and magnesium losses were lower than levels before the study began, when the women were on normal diets.

Man shoots suspect in revenge

LAKE WORTH, Fla. — A man who warned police he would shoot a burglar after his home was robbed two nights in a row was facing attempted murder charges Tuesday for allegedly ambushing a suspect on the third night.

John Howard, 29, was free on $5,000 bond Tuesday after spending part of Monday in the Palm Beach County Jail. He is charged with attempted first-degree murder, police Sgt. Bob Walton said.

David Taylor, 28, was in critical condition Tuesday at JFK Medical Center with a bullet wound to his head.

"I can go along with (protecting property) to a point," Walton said. "But I don't think anybody can just take the law into their own hands like this."

Howard lost a camera in a burglary Friday night. Saturday night a thief stole his electric guitar, a hard blow for a man who wants to be a rock star.

"He told an officer 'next time I'll shoot him,' and that's what he did," Walton said. "He set a trap."

Sunday night, police said, Howard pretended not to be home and hid in the bushes with a .22-caliber handgun.

Mecham wins temporary delay

PHOENIX, Ariz. — Embattled Gov. Evan Mecham won a temporary delay Tuesday of a grand jury investigation of an unreported $350,000 campaign loan while he tries to have the state attorney general removed from the case.

The state grand jury investigation had been scheduled to begin Tuesday, and the Republican governor was among those subpoenaed to testify.

However, an Arizona Supreme Court justice stayed the proceeding so the full court may consider Mecham's argument that Attorney General Bob Corbin has a conflict of interest and should not handle the investigation. The Supreme Court is scheduled to consider the special action on Nov. 10.

Blazing truck rolls to bottom of K-Hill

By Judy Lundstrom
Special Projects Editor

Investigation continued Tuesday into a weekend incident in which a pickup was set afire and pushed off the K-Hill near Highway 177 south-east of Manhattan.

The camouflage-colored pickup, a 1973-79 General Motors Corp. model, became tangled in a cluster of trees and landed about 20 feet above McDowell Creek Road, said Officer Sam Thomson, with the Riley County Police Department.

Police found no identification on the vehicle and don't know who it belongs to, Thomson said.

Witnesses reported that the incident occurred between 10:30 and 11 p.m. Saturday. Police speculate the incident was a Halloween prank.

Police found two 50-gallon drums at the site that had apparently contained diesel, Thomson said. Evidence at the scene indicated the suspects had filled the bed of the truck with straw bales, then broken apart several bales and stuffed the loose straw in the cab. Then, he said, they poured one barrel of diesel down the hill in hopes of burning the hill.

The pickup was set on fire, but the fire was extinguished from the impact of the crash, Thomson said.

"If the diesel and the K had gotten together, we'd have had the K-Hill lit up," he said. "It could have been a mess."

Thomson said police suspect the pickup may have been stolen, but no reports of theft have been filed with RCPD.

"About the only charge I've got on them right now is littering," he said.

The pickup, which was totaled in the crash, could have caused extensive damage if it had landed on McDowell Creek Road or caught the hill on fire, Thomson said.

Reports from witnesses indicated at least two suspects were involved in the incident, he said. From the "limited description" given police, he said the suspects were probably not old enough to be college students.

Thomson said the recent rains helped prevent a potential disaster on the hill.

"If it had been a week ago, we'd still be burning," he said. "I'm sure they intended to start a fire and a blaze of glory on Halloween."

Removal of the pickup will not be an easy task, he said. And, unless police catch the suspects, the task will be the responsibility of the property owner.

The K-Hill, as it is popularly called, originated in 1921 when the Civil Engineering Society built a K made of concrete into the hill overlooking the Kansas River. In 1930, Sigma Tau, an engineering honorary, added an S.

Currently, responsibility for maintenance of the hill belongs to Tau Beta Pi, an all-engineering honorary that has replaced Sigma Tau, said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering and sponsor of the group.

Ownership of the tract, however, is not quite so clear.

Sigma Tau held the original deed to the property, said Frank Tillman, professor of industrial engineering and former sponsor of the group. After its merger with Tau Beta Pi, all assets went to the national headquarters in Knoxville, Tenn.

Along with the assets went K-Hill.

"They really didn't want it," he said, "so we had to prepare a deed and the University accepted the deed. To the best of my knowledge, the University does own it."

University officials had not been notified of the incident as of Tuesday afternoon.

Rathbone said the engineering department knew nothing about it.

"We'll have to take a look at it before we come up with a solution," he said.

"I'm surprised no one has contacted us," said Charles Beckom, K-State police superintendent.

He added, however, that he wasn't concerned that RCPD had not notified him.

"This is a fringe area that could fall under both jurisdictions," he said. "And any help we can get we'll take."

Bar Association president to speak

By The Collegian Staff

The president of the Kansas Bar Association will address the subject of "Women and the Law in Kansas" at 7 tonight at the Manhattan Fire Station, located at the corner of Denison and Kimball avenues. Christel Marquardt, a Topeka attorney, is the first woman to be elected president of the association in 105 years.

Her speech will include employment issues, pay equity, child custody in divorces and the legal aspects of other subjects concerning women.

Joe Knopp, majority leader of the Kansas House of Representatives and attorney in Manhattan, will speak following Marquardt. He will present a legislative perspective on the same issues she addresses.

The public is invited to attend free of charge.

The program is jointly sponsored by the Riley County League of Women Voters, the Manhattan Chapter of Women in Communications Inc., District D of the Kansas Home Economics Association, Business and Professional Women, and the American Association of University Women.

Blood drive surpasses set goal

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's four-day blood drive last week was a success, according to statistics released Tuesday.

University students, faculty and the people of Manhattan donated 1,574 pints of blood, surpassing the 1,500-pint goal set by campus organizers and the Wichita Red Cross.

"Students donated 75 percent, and the rest came from faculty and the people from town," said Eric Ireland, senior in accounting and student coordinator of the bloodmobile.

Despite a low amount of preliminary appointments, more than 200 pints were collected this fall than last spring. Last spring, slightly fewer than 1,400 pints were donated, Ireland said.

The bloodmobile will return to K-State during the last week of February.

Too many children slip through faulty system

She cried once too often and will never be heard crying, laughing or living again.

She is only one of many nameless children now lying in graves because of a social problem society called child abuse.

Each year in the United States 1,500 to 3,000 children, most younger than 2, die as a result of abuse suffered at the hands of their guardians.

In Kansas, from July 1, 1986, until June 30, 1987, 12 children were identified as having died as a direct result of child abuse or neglect. These were only the cases that were identified by the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, and undoubtedly there were cases which were inappropriately identified as assaults, drownings, natural causes or even sudden infant death syndrome.

KDSRS received 27,814 reports of abuse and neglect last year, and of those reports only 18.5 percent were confirmed. The U.S. House Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families cites a national rate of 45 percent confirmation.

Either Kansas is a state relatively free from the horrors of child abuse, or people in the state are not reporting the suspected abuses because of inconveniences in Kansas' reporting methods and lack of centralization in the KDSRS.

In Kansas, reports must be made to local agency offices during office hours and to police other times.

If the call is made to the police, they are to give the report to the agency the next working day — that could mean up to three days later in some cases. Kansas law sets no time limit for investigations, but policy requires workers to see the alleged victim of abuse within 24 hours. Victims of neglect must be seen within seven days.

But in Kansas, workers carry at least 40 cases at a time and often more. National professional groups say protective service workers should handle a maximum of 20 cases at a time. Many states have implemented standards requiring that workers handle no more than a maximum case number. Missouri standards dictate no more than 25.

To make matters worse, the number of SRS workers in Kansas has declined from 493 in 1981 to 431 today, a 13 percent drop in a period when abuse investigations rose 13 percent.

In a society full of social problems, and in an area where funding is often reduced in lean fiscal times, not all programs can have all the money they need. However, saving the life of even one child is worth the amount of money spent to deal with the problem.

A toll-free child abuse hotline that is available 24 hours a day is needed, as are additional case workers to more thoroughly investigate abuse reports.

The solution cannot be attained without Kansans demanding that their state legislators make changes in a currently faulty system.

These changes may cost Kansas, but can anyone put a price tag on a child's life?

Education is slighted by lack of lottery profit

Kansas has once again ignored an available source of funding for education.

When proponents of a state-sponsored lottery argued the proposal's merits during last year's general election, they said one of the things the lottery could be used for is education. They pointed to other states, including Missouri, that had promised money from their games would help fund education. None of those states have yet done so, and it appears Kansas will follow this trend.

From each Kansas lottery dollar: 30 cents will be for the state to allocate as it wishes, and the other 70 cents will go for prizes, expenses and retailers. Of the state's cut, 3 cents will go for prison overcrowding, 9 cents for reappraisal and 18 cents for economic development.

Not many people could argue with this split. Kansas does need to lessen the overcrowded living conditions in its prisons. More money needs to be available to pursue economic development opportunities, and reappraisal needs to be paid for.

The problem is that when the current property reappraisal is finished in 1989, the lottery portion designated for reappraisal use is going to be turned over to the economic development fund. This money should be used for education instead.

From the 18 million tickets the state hopes to sell, officials estimate $540,000 will be raised for prisons, $1.6 million for reappraisal and $3.2 million for economic development.

If these figures are carried to 1989 — it could mean $9.6 million annually to go somewhere else. As the rules stand now, economic development will begin collecting that money on top of the $19.2 million already allocated.

A lottery spokesman said the games were not meant to lower property taxes but are to "supplement budgets." What budget in this state needs more supplementing than education?

It seems state officials are so eager to fund other things — like economic development and highways to attract businesses and people — that they lose sight of the fact that strong schools are one of the best recruitment tools. They can fund other programs all they want, but people will not come to a state with a poor educational system.

The lottery might not lower property taxes, wipe out prison overcrowding or lure a huge manufacturing facility to the state, but it could help spread extra money to where it is most needed. And education should be at the top of the list.

Didya ever wonder?... Some things forever unanswered

Do you ever wonder about some of the things that go on in the world? You know, why things are the way they are, or why people think the way they do. Well, I do. Too much, probably. But there are some things that I have never quite figured out. Here are just a few of these "wonderings":

About TV ads, I wonder...

■ Does anyone really purchase a new car because of a television advertisement? I would think that a little more thought would go into such a major purchase.

■ Does anyone really care whether or not the lettuce and tomato on their hamburger is cold? I don't.

■ Speaking of hamburgers, does anyone really want thick, lean, juicy hamburgers? It seems to me that most Americans like their fast-food burgers thin and a little greasy.

■ Does anyone really believe the disclaimer on lottery commercials which says that they're for "educational purposes only" and are "not meant to induce anyone to play the lottery"?

About the K-State campus, I wonder...

■ Does anyone really think the mobile in the Union courtyard is appealing to the eye? Mobiles like that were popular in the time the Union addition was built, but I think its time has passed. How about a waterfall? Or maybe something in neon.

■ Does anyone really know what the purpose of a crosswalk is? On this campus, pedestrians only have the right of way if no cars are around.

■ Does anyone really study in the stacks of Farrell Library, or do they spend all of their time writing and reading the graffiti on the desks?

■ Speaking of Farrell, what were those architects thinking when they designed the additions? I've yet to figure out exactly how the three phases are supposed to match.

■ Does anyone really believe student

Commentary

DOUG FOLK
Collegian Columnist

body president candidates when they promise to solve the parking problem on campus? I wish I had a nickel for every time I've heard that one.

About the world of sports, I wonder...

■ Does anyone really feel sorry for KU coach Bob Valesente when he whines about getting no respect from this coach or that columnist. Sorry, Bob. Your 'Hawks are a good team. Why, why...they're great! Y-yeah...and they'll...why, they'll go to the Orange Bowl! Yeah, that's it...that's the ticket.

■ Will anyone in Kansas City really care whether Bo Jackson abandons baseball for football?

■ Does anyone really feel sorry for professional football players because they're not free to leave the team they're on? Hey guys, you can leave whenever you like. Maybe you could get a job in a factory building door handles for that Porche you're driving.

About shopping trips, I wonder...

■ Why do people sit and wait five minutes for a parking space that is 10 feet closer than the one they could have pulled into?

■ Why is it so difficult to figure out which direction to drive down the rows in the parking lot?

■ Does anyone ever buy that last can on the shelf? After all, there must be a reason that no one else has bought it, right?

■ Why is there no such thing as "diet" beer? Or "lo-cal"? The term "light" seems a little inaccurate. Does the beer weigh less?

■ Why do I always get behind the little old lady who has to have three price checks, picked up the wrong brand of tomato sauce and has 37 coupons, half of which are expired?

About the state of Kansas, I wonder...

■ Does Gov. Mike Hayden remember his own college days, when he was attending K-State and was unable to pay his fraternity house bill? One would think that this personal experience would help him to understand the financial woes of college students.

■ Does anyone really take anything that the Rev. Richard Taylor says seriously? If God would have wanted morality forced on us, he could have done that himself. I think making our own decisions is part of the deal.

■ Has the Kansas Board of Regents become so concerned with the image of the state's educational institutions that it has forgotten about the people these institutions were built to serve?

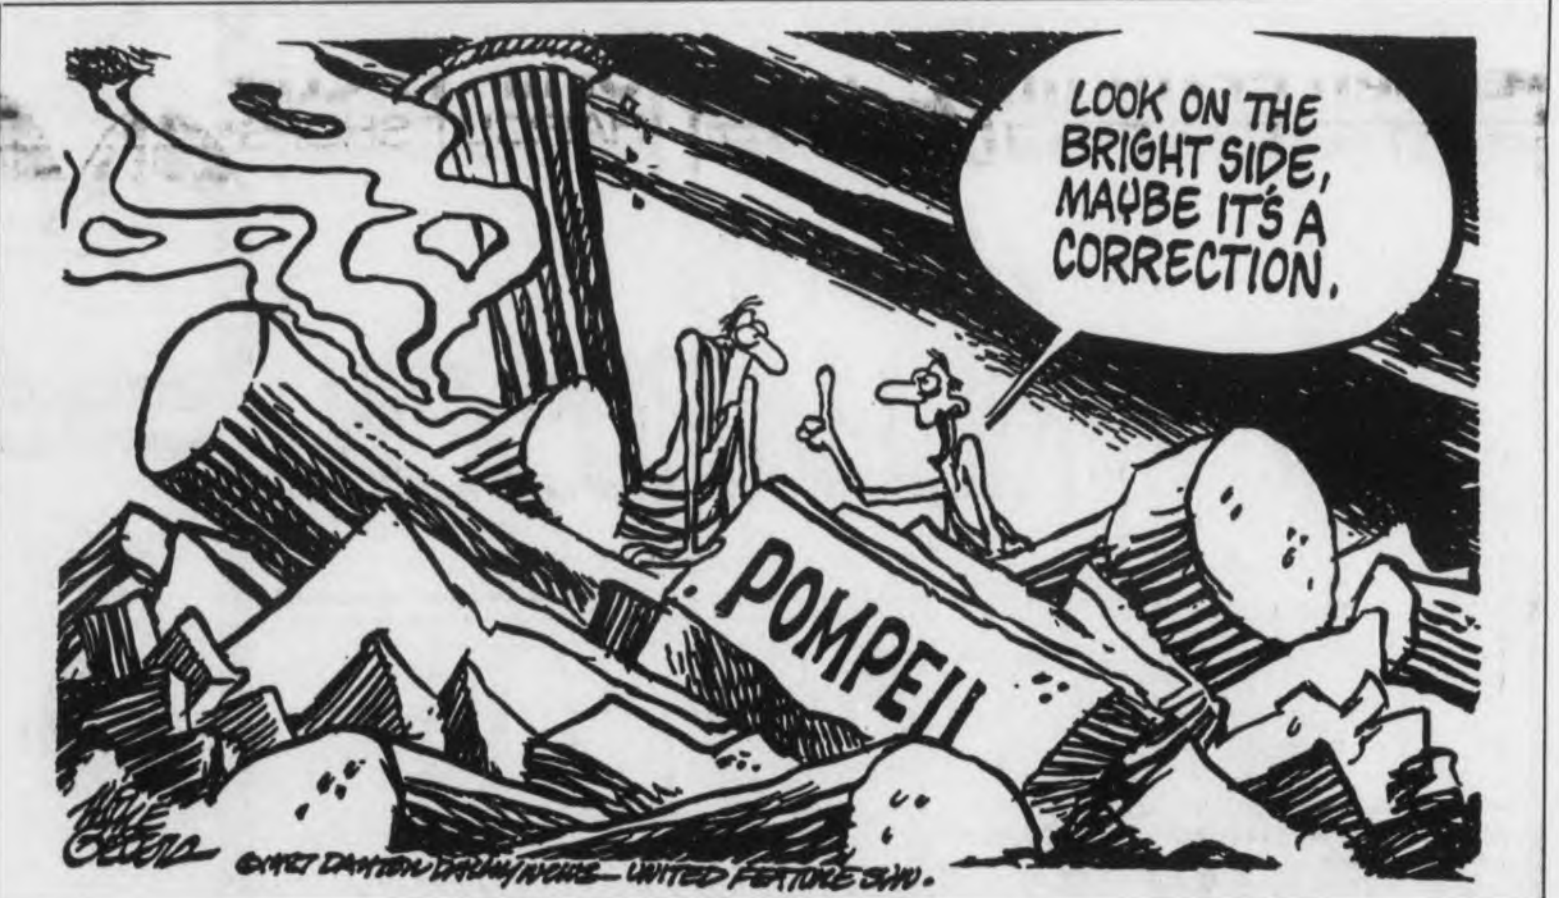

About the nation, I wonder...

■ Does President Reagan see the irony in his chiding of the Senate for making full use of one of its constitutional checks by interviewing and rejecting a Supreme Court nominee? That power was put there for a reason, Ron.

■ Does anybody really like any of the U.S. presidential candidates? Have we been in this situation before?

■ Can anybody really keep Fawn Hall, Jessica Hahn, and Donna Rice straight? They were all attractive women involved in scandals, but which one is which?

There's one other thing I find myself wondering from time to time: Does anybody really read this column?

French cabbies' device shocking

Amid the discussion of admissions policies, student government elections and the stock market, I recently ran across a rather strange news article that raised my eyebrows to new heights.

As everyone knows, it's not easy to get the whole truth and nothing but the truth from news reports these days. Take, for example, the following press report:

Taxi drivers in Paris, France, may soon be equipping their cabs with hot seats packing 52,000 volts of electricity.

Don't feel bad if you had to read that one twice. I'm still not sure I believe it! Let me see if I can explain it.

Called le siege qui brule, or the seat that burns, the device is designed to "discourage" those who try to attack cab drivers. With the push of a discreetly placed pedal, the taxi driver can send the electricity coursing for one second through the back seat, stunning the passenger.

Now let's think about this. From the "city of love" comes the concept of frying any would-be attackers or backseat drivers. I've always thought an eject button like the one in Batman's Batmobile would be appropriate for passengers that behaved inappropriately, but this is even better. Read on.

According to the article, five prototype cabs with the seats are cruising the city, and a cabbies' union leader said he hopes the devices will be available to all drivers who want them by the end of the year. Supposedly, there are already 100 seats on order. The French seem to have created their very own form of Russian Roulette, because passengers will never know if they're in one of "the cabs" or not (unless, I suppose, you decide to test the driver by telling him you're an American and/or you forgot all your money). You might also find out if your driver is adept at distinguishing his clutch from the "shock pedal."

JUDD ANNIS
Collegian Columnist

"It's a marvelous system," said Norbert Ben-Arous, federal secretary for the Workers Force National Federation of Transport. "It's invisible, it's interchangeable, and it's efficient." Ben-Arous does have a point. This neat little device, designed to create docile passengers, is light years ahead (no pun intended) of the guillotine. And who said technology isn't advancing our society?

But a representative of riders blasted the invention in a statement Thursday.

"The danger of such a demented project is obvious for anyone who is sane," said Jean-Claude Delarue of the Federation of Transport Users. "Why not also install a cobra in a cage in the back seat that the driver can open when he wants?"

I can see it now. "You want me to change a what?!" and out comes Mr. Hood-n-Fangs to teach you a lesson. French taxi passengers would undoubtedly help boost mongoose sales in that city's pet stores.

Ben-Arous said the system would not endanger the life of anyone zapped, because although the voltage is high, the amperage is weak. He said Paris public hospitals tested the device on five types of pacemakers and found it harmless.

British Broadcasting Corp. reporter John Silverman, accompanied by a cardiologist, a lawyer and an insurance agent (demonstrating his total faith in the device), took a personal test last week.

"I actually recorded it. I let out a tremendous yell," Silverman said. "But within a few seconds, I was OK."

Blood pressure and electrocardiogram tests taken before and after the experience showed no noticeable difference, he said.

Ben-Arous has applied to the city for a permit to install a hot seat in the taxi of any driver wanting one. Until permission is granted, the five demonstration cabs are prohibited from turning the current on an attacker.

These latest developments in the world of taxicabs make New York cabbies seem like drivers education instructors. Ben-Arous and the French cabbies are helping prove what I've always suspected — the world's not becoming any saner, we're just growing more accustomed to it.

Correction

Due to an editor's error, an editorial in Tuesday's Collegian wrongly stated that polling places in Cardwell Hall and the Derby Food Center were functional for Student Governing Association elections this week. Those polling places will begin operation in 1988.

Faculty member developing programs

Bergen to aid Kansas with sex education

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

A K-State faculty member is playing a vital role in helping Kansas implement its newly mandated human sexuality and acquired immune deficiency syndrome programs in schools.

Betsy Bergen, associate professor of human development and family studies, has been traveling throughout Kansas to help school districts develop and implement comprehensive and developmentally appropriate programs on human sexuality and AIDS education.

"I'm doing this partly in interest for my department, this college (Human Ecology) and the University," Bergen said. "Also because I have a personal interest in our young people having adequate information on sexuality and AIDS."

"People need more information about sexuality and relationships than they can get in the locker room, playground and the back seat of a car."

"Betsy is one of the experts in the state in this area," said Linda Johnson, home economics specialist and member of the State Board of Education staff.

Bergen developed the first human sexuality classes at K-State, "You and Your Sexuality" and "Human Sexuality." She did her doctoral research at the University on sexual attitudes and behaviors of college students.

Bergen said Kansas became one of the few states to mandate sexuality education when the State Board of Education decided in May 1987 that Kansas schools must implement programs in human sexuality and AIDS beginning in September 1988.

"The members of the State Board of Education are the policymakers," Bergen said. "The staff actually developed the preliminary guidelines for sexuality and AIDS education and has presented those in public forums in six locations within the state."

"I think sexuality education for youth is long overdue in Kansas," Bergen's role is to help schools develop and implement sexuality programs.

"Several school districts are concerned about how to implement the mandate and still satisfy all the community members," Bergen said. "Many people are concerned as to how they will do this, who will teach it, and how to get it into an already crowded schedule."

Bergen said human sexuality education covers a much broader range of concepts and issues than mere sex education.

"Sexuality affects all that we are. The fact that you and I are born female (or male) makes a difference in all that we do," she said.

"If it were not so important, why is the first question everyone asks when a baby is born is, 'Is it a boy?' or 'Is it a girl?'"

The mandate states the programs should be developmentally appropriate, but it leaves it up to the local school districts to implement the program "any way they see fit," Bergen said.

"The guidelines are just suggestions," she said, "not the law."

"Developmentally appropriate" means the information given the students should be suitable for whatever age they are. Bergen said children should be told about their sexuality and about AIDS, but at their level of understanding.

"If a child asks, 'What is AIDS?', he or she deserves an answer at a level he or she can understand," Bergen said.

She said the recent publicity about AIDS and the three young AIDS patients who could not go to school in Florida has made many children curious about AIDS.

"Some people don't want it (sexuality education) in schools at all," Bergen said. "It (sexuality) is such an important part of us. Why would we not want to teach it and learn about it? It just boggles my mind."

Bergen disagrees with the argument that sexuality education will increase sexual experimentation among youth.

"That argument doesn't hold any kind of water," she said. "Education and knowledge make people good citizens with concern of what happens to themselves and others."

"It doesn't make sense that kids would be reckless, promiscuous and wild because we teach them. Lack of education has certainly not stopped them from experimenting."

Discussing options K-State to host career night

By Shawn Dorsch
Collegian Reporter

High school juniors, seniors and their parents are invited to learn about K-State, free of charge, from those who have attended or are attending the University.

The K-State Alumni Association is hosting a special career night at the Manhattan Holiday Inn & Holidome tonight at 7.

Leslye Schneider, senior in pre-medicine and president of Student Alumni Board, said career night gives high school students the chance to learn about the University from those with first-hand experience.

Schneider said K-State students who are members of Student Alumni Board talk with the high school students about college life. They discuss housing options at K-

State and extracurricular activities such as clubs and sports, and they also talk about the adjustment from high school to college.

In addition, they discuss how to budget time and answer any other questions the high school students may have about college and the University, she said.

Area alumni professionals will also attend the meeting to tell the high school students about career options and what it takes to get into those careers, Schneider said.

The high school students and their parents are separated when they get to the career night, she added.

"The parents visit with Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, while the high school students visit with K-State students," she said.

All colleges will be represented at the meeting and will have information tables set up.

"One or two students from the Student Alumni Board will be at each table to answer questions and tell which classes to take the last year in high school and which classes to enroll in for the freshman year of college for the different majors," Schneider said.

Manhattan is not the only location in the state to have a career night, she said.

"Career nights will also be held in Topeka, Wichita, Salina, Lawrence, Kansas City, Kan., and Hays," Schneider said.

"The career night at Kansas City, Kan., usually has a bigger turnout than the one in Manhattan — we expect about 100 for the Manhattan career night," Schneider said.

Unemployed chemist arrested for threatening George Shultz

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An unemployed chemist armed with three guns and at least 600 bullets was arrested Tuesday after allegedly telling his mother he was going to kill Secretary of State George P. Shultz, authorities said.

Edward Lewis Gallo, 41, of Worcester, Mass., was taken into custody at a local hotel and charged with making a threat against a public official.

A semi-automatic version of an M-16 rifle, two shotguns and 600 to 700 rounds of ammunition were removed from Gallo's car.

Speaking briefly to reporters as he was being led by police to be booked, Gallo said, "I'm a tourist. I don't know ... I'm a tourist on vacation. I've been down here on vacation two or three other times."

Asked about weapons, Gallo said, "I was going to go hunting. That's why I'm on vacation."

Gallo was taken by police from a hotel in northeast Washington, several miles away from the State Department, after a brief struggle outside his room at about 7:50 a.m. The hotel's 22 guests were evacuated, according to police spokesman Wendell Samuels.

Several blocks of New York Avenue were closed during the morning rush hour, creating a huge traffic backup on the major commuter thoroughfare.

Sgt. Michael Vacca of the Worcester Police Department said in a telephone interview he was told by members of the Gallo family that the suspect had recently lost his job as a chemist for the city of Worcester and was "pretty unstable."

Vacca said he was told that Gallo left home Monday with a gun wrapped in his army jacket.

He said he knew nothing about Gallo's political affiliations. He said Gallo's mother and a sister of the suspect in Pennsylvania had mentioned that Shultz might be a potential target, Vacca said.

SQUASH

The Fall Ornamental and Edible Vegetable

Squash, probably one of the vegetables most commonly left on children's plates because of its "yucky" taste and "funny-looking" texture, surprisingly has many uses and can be cooked in a variety of appetizing ways.

Many different kinds of squash are both edible and ornamental and are available throughout the year. However, squash can be divided into two basic categories: summer and winter varieties.

Summer squash, which is available all year round, is high in vitamin C, contains only 25 calories per cup and has a mild, delicate flavor.

The most common type of summer squash is zucchini.

Summer squash is best selected when it is small to medium in size and has a firm, smooth, glossy skin.

When preparing summer squash, do not peel the skin; instead, leave the squash whole and cut it into slices.

Summer squash can be served in a variety of ways. One suggestion is to serve it raw with other vegetables for dipping. It can also be shredded and mixed with a dressing to make a slaw.

Another popular way to eat squash is to season it with basil, oregano or dill weed, top it with shredded cheddar, Swiss or Jack cheese, and broil it until the cheese is bubbly.

Winter squash, the second type of squash, is also a good source of vitamin C and is low in sodium. Winter squash is actually harvested in autumn, but it can be stored for months because of its hard, thick shell.

Some of the most popular varieties of winter squash are spaghetti, acorn, butternut and the pumpkin.

When choosing whole winter squash, select the ones with a hard, thick-shelled skin.

"Winter squash is very versatile in the ways that you can cook it," said Larry Costlow, manager of Westside Market.

"Spaghetti squash has a taste similar to spaghetti, except it is a little sweeter," he said. "You can cook it and eat it with spaghetti sauce."

"Acorn squash can be baked and topped with brown sugar, or it can be stuffed with meat for a dinner entree," Costlow said.

To make a winter squash slaw, the book "Sunset Fresh Produce From A to Z" suggests peeling and shredding raw squash, adding raisins and chopped nuts, then topping it with seasoned mayonnaise.

Squash can be used as a decoration as well as a cooking commodity. Most people use squash, also called ornamental gourds, during the autumn months as holiday centerpieces.

To prepare the gourds for indoor display, Yvonne Young Tarr, author of "The Squash Cookbook," says to use a soft cloth saturated with a strong disinfectant to remove any dirt. The gourds should then be stored for three days in a dry, well-ventilated spot until the rinds are hard and dry.

When arranging the gourds, position them so they do not touch each other and turn them occasionally, said Tarr.

Tarr also recommended applying one or two applications of shellac or ordinary floor wax to preserve the gourds.

Despite the belief that squash is a fall vegetable or decoration, it is available year round. With its many uses and varieties, squash should be used for more than Halloween jack-o-lanterns and table decorations.

Recipes

Squash and Chicken with two Cheeses

- 2 3-pound chickens, cut in quarters
- 3 tablespoons butter
- 2 onions, peeled and sliced
- 2 medium-sized zucchini or other summer squash
- 4 slices fresh white bread, with crusts removed
- 1 cup heavy cream
- 1 egg
- 5 tablespoons Parmesan cheese
- salt and black pepper
- ½ pound cheddar cheese, cut in ¼-inch cubes

Directions: Remove skins from the chickens. Place chicken pieces in a large pot with water to cover, and cook until tender, about 35 minutes.

Meanwhile, prepare the squash. Peel squash if skins are tough, and cut squash into ½-inch slices. Saute squash and onion slices in butter for 10 minutes, stirring frequently. Cover pan and cook over low heat until vegetables are tender.

Cut the bread into ½-inch cubes; add cream, egg and Parmesan, and mix to a paste. Preheat oven to 375 degrees.

Spread vegetables in a shallow, ovenproof dish and top with chicken pieces. Sprinkle with salt and pepper to taste. Spread the bread paste evenly over all, dot with cheddar cheese and bake 20-25 minutes or until golden brown.

If you're in a hurry, place dish on middle oven shelf and broil 10-15 minutes or until nicely browned.

Summer Squash Appetizer

2 medium-size or 1 oversize summer squash, peeled and cut in ½-inch cubes (discard seeds)

3 strips bacon, diced

2 medium-size onions, peeled and chopped

3 ribs celery, trimmed and chopped

3 tablespoons each of honey and ketchup

1½ tablespoons lemon juice

½ teaspoon salt

¼ teaspoon ground cinnamon

Generous pinch each of ground cloves and marjoram

Directions: Parboil the squash in water to cover for 3 minutes, then drain well. Saute the bacon, onions and celery over medium heat for 5 minutes. Add the squash and remaining ingredients and cook, stirring continuously for 5 minutes more or until the mixture is fairly thick. Serve cold or at room temperature on crackers or toast points.

Mock Pineapple Pie

No one will ever guess that squash is the secret ingredient in this fruity pie.

Hotel food service often slower than the trip

Traveling. Oh, how I hate it. The endless packing and unpacking. The endless hours spent sitting in a vehicle that moves with the grace of a blender on puree.

I was fortunate enough to travel this weekend to the city of the arch: St. Louis.

Stumbling off the now stable vehicle we had traveled in, looking like a bundle of dirty laundry (and smelling like it too), we proceeded to the hotel restaurant to fill our aching stomachs.

It is funny how hotel restaurants are in a world of their own when it comes to serving food. They seat you in a flash, but then the waiter who seated you becomes non-existent. The only way to attract your waiter is by flashing a crisp twenty, and suddenly from the woodwork waiters and waitresses emerge from everywhere.

Food for Thought

SUSAN STAGGENBORG
Feature Editor

They take your orders with happy grins, and they are gone. For a good hour. The salad you ordered arrives limp and wilted, the tea is watery and the rolls are hard.

They leave again, this time for another good hour. You came to eat breakfast, but by the time your pancakes and eggs arrive, you should be asking for the lunch menu.

Why is this? How do they get away with serving meals with cold centers like a rare steak?

First, they disguise it by covering your plate with an elegant-looking pewter cover. Sneaky. When you lift the cover off, you just let out what little heat was left.

My advice on this problem of how to avoid paying big bucks for a less-than-palatable meal? Find the nearest fast-food restaurant and enjoy a cheap, tasty meal in a snap.

Practical Pointers

The handy tips are back, although they are of a varied sort.

■ When dragging out the paint and brush to touch up your walls, try putting the handle of your roller or brush through a paper plate. It will save a lot of cleanup later as the plate will catch the drips.

■ Scissors can be kept razor sharp by cutting up a piece of sandpaper every so often.

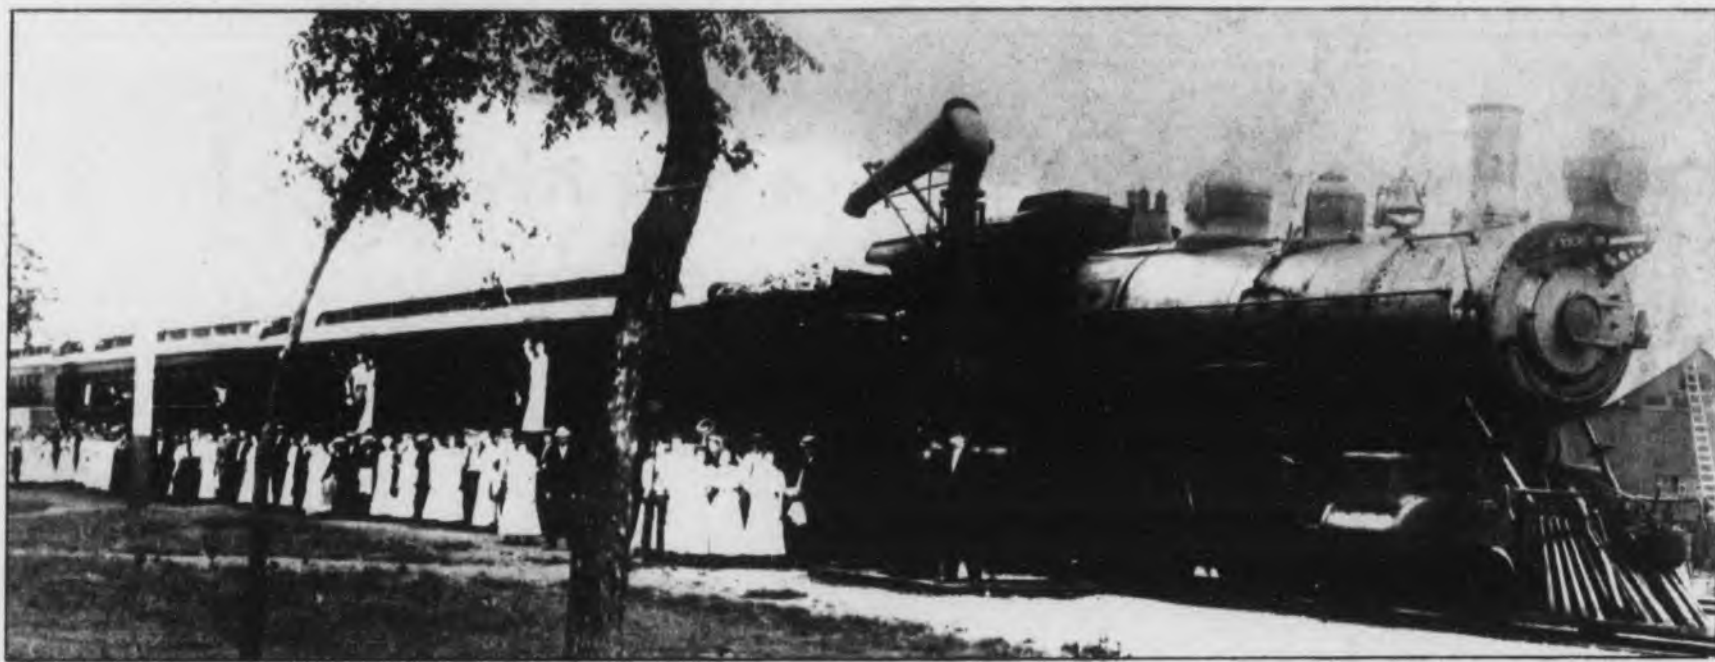

■ Scratches on the face of your watch can be removed by dipping a cotton ball soaked in nail polish remover. Rub it over the face of the watch. Works like a charm.

■ Your so-called permanent press pants can be unwrinkled by taking them out of the washer and hanging them upside down by the legs. The weight of the pants will take out most of the wrinkles.

■ Keep your laundry hamper from smelling like a gym locker by sprinkling some baking soda into it or tucking some small slivers of soap at the bottom. Of course, doing laundry as often as possible helps.

Members of the 1912 Webster and Eurodelphian Societies board a Union Pacific train bound for Wamego for a picnic in the city park.

Social Life of Yesteryear

In 1987, students have the opportunity to be members of fraternal groups like Pi Beta Phi, Omega Psi Phi, Sigma Chi or Alpha Kappa Alpha. But in 1927, students were more likely to be members of the Ionians, the Brownings, the Websters or the Alpha Betas.

These groups were the literary societies that dominated student social life at Kansas State Agricultural College from the 1860s to the 1940s.

Sheryl Ballard, senior in history, has researched those literary societies.

"The purpose of the literary societies was to give members training and development along literary and forensic lines," Ballard said.

In the fall of 1863, the first literary society — the Bluemonds — was formed with 13 male members. The group split into the Websters and the Alpha Betas in 1868. Those groups were gaining in popularity when the Hamiltons began in 1884 with 16 members.

"The purpose of the literary societies was to give members training and development along literary and forensic lines."
—Sheryl Ballard

The first women's society, the Ionians, began in 1887. In 1902, the Franklin society was the first coed group established. This group believed coeducation was desirable for the broadest development of an individual.

Between 1904 and 1910, two more women's societies, the Eurodelphians and the Brownings, and one male society, the Athenians, were established.

Society meetings were first held in Anderson Hall. Due to overcrowded conditions, meetings later were held in Fairchild Hall and in Nichols Gymnasium (now known as Nichols Hall).

To be a member of a literary society, an individual had to be a student working toward a college degree. Each society presented a program at its weekly meeting, and each member was required to participate in several programs a year. The member might be required to debate, to write a paper and then present it, to give an extemporaneous speech or to furnish music.

Business meetings were held after the programs in order to train members in parliamentary procedures. Discussion was limited to five to 10 minutes, and each person could speak only twice on a subject matter.

Although the meetings were not secretive, student visitors were permitted to attend by invitation only. Faculty members were permitted to come and go as they pleased.

Meetings usually opened with devotion, Scripture reading and prayer. There was usually a musical selection or two, followed by prepared readings, essays, extemporaneous speeches, debates and parliamentary drills.

"The societies became the social center of life at KSAC between the years of 1880 and 1920," Ballard said.

The men and women in the societies banded together to form brother/sister societies — which allowed the groups to take hikes, go on hayrack rides and attend banquets together. Each of these events was chaperoned by a faculty member.

Ballard said the societies would take hikes to Pillsbury Crossing, Rocky Ford and Wildcat Creek. The women provided lunches, and the men brought their musical instruments. They would have concerts and then hike back to town.

"They had a gay old time, I believe," Ballard said.

"The most important event for all eight societies was the Intersociety Oratorical Contest," she said.

Each society chose a representative member to participate in the contest. Ballard said members considered it the very highest honor to be selected.

Societies were allowed to present a musical chant or cheer before their member presented his or her oratorical selection, and the individual who won the contest received a cash prize.

The contest was held in the largest building available, and the building was decorated with the banners and colors of each society. During the contest, the building was packed with students and townspeople.

"Many people were turned away at the door because there were no available seats or standing room," Ballard said.

The literary societies believed in the importance of providing libraries for their members. By 1885, the Websters had 250 volumes in their library. To help fund their library projects, the Alpha Betas and the Websters put on plays for the enjoyment of students, faculty and townspeople.

An 1876 issue of the Industrialist, a magazine put out by KSAC, noted the Alpha Betas presented a drama on Thanksgiving evening to purchase books for their library. Admission was 50 cents for reserved seats and 35 cents for general admission.

By 1885, the societies' libraries had been sold because the college library had grown so large that separate libraries were no longer necessary. The profits from the books sold were used to furnish the literary societies' rooms in Fairchild Hall.

"The societies became the social center of life at KSAC between the years of 1880 and 1920."

—Sheryl Ballard

"The plays of the literary societies continued to be a nice money-making project, not just for the societies, but for the other college activities," Ballard said.

"Many of the plays were major productions," she said.

Some of the proceeds from the plays went to the campus athletic association and the YWCA.

Each literary society also published its own society paper. The papers consisted of personal tidbits about members, articles about past and future activities, poems and essays.

K-State volleyball players leap in joy after defeating the No. 6-ranked University of Nebraska, 15-8, in the second game of their Big Eight match Tuesday in Ahearn Field House. The win by the Wildcats marked the second game the Cornhuskers have lost to a Big Eight opponent this season. Nebraska won the match 15-7, 8-15, 15-7, 15-4, in winning their 58th consecutive conference match.

Walk-on may get his shot

By Bill Long
Sports Writer

For Tom Dillon, size isn't important. It's how bad one wants to play and the determination that counts. "I was always told, 'you have to be big to play college football,'" said the 5-foot 6-inch, 175 pound junior running back for K-State. "I believe in playing my hardest every down and just take what happens."

What happened last Saturday during the 'Cats 56-7 loss to Oklahoma State was definitely a dream come true for Dillon.

"I wasn't expecting things to go that well for me, actually," he said.

"What he did last Saturday was just phenomenal."

—Stan Parrish

And his results of running through the holes resulted in 182 yards in total offense — 128 yards on kickoff returns, 43 yards rushing, 11 yards in receiving and a touchdown.

"What he did last Saturday was just phenomenal," coach Stan Parrish said. "If they gave a Heisman Trophy for effort and heart, he definitely earned it that day."

"What can you say about a guy like that," he added. "He walked onto our program last spring and survived the workouts and the ribbing from other players. Being a walk-on is not a glamorous life and it's kind of lonely. It just shows what kind of person he is, making it this far."

And did last Saturday's performance earn him a starting spot?

"Well, we usually don't announce our starters until later in the week," Parrish said. "But I can tell you right now that he is in our offensive plans."

Staff/Steve Wolgast

After 182 yards total offense against OSU last Saturday, K-State running back Tom Dillon has gone from third or fourth string to being considered for the starting job against the Jayhawks.

Being in any kind of plans is all Dillon was hoping for when he decided to walk on last year during the "12th Man" tryouts.

"I felt I did good when the tryouts were held," he said. "I found out later that because of my age I would lose two years of eligibility. I was just actually hoping to make the team as a walk-on and I did."

"It's been kind of hard sitting there as a third or fourth stringer thinking that there is some way I can help the team. Right now I'm glad coach Parrish gave me the chance to play last Saturday."

And that play, he said, is a world of difference from his high school playing days.

Dillon's playing days were at Manhattan Luckey High School, now closed due to financial difficulties, which had an enrollment of about 80 students.

"When I was in high school, I was used to playing in front of about 300 to 400 people," he said. "Now there are some games when we have to play in front of about 70,000 people."

Right now Dillon is happy that he

Nebraska bends, refuses to break in downing 'Cats

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

Ahearn Field House was rocking Tuesday night as the 6th-ranked Nebraska volleyball team came to town to see if it could run its string of Big Eight Conference victories to 58.

The 'Huskers won the match 3-1 but K-State was able to win one game in the four game match. It was only the second game of the year Nebraska has lost in Big Eight play and the first time since 1985 the Wildcats have won a game against Nebraska.

"...I was definitely pleased with our performance....We played a very, very solid volleyball team here tonight. It would have been a real quick match if we hadn't raised our intensity level like we did."

—Scott Nelson

Nebraska won the match by taking the first game, 15-7, losing the second game, 8-15, then winning the third and fourth games 15-7 and 15-4 respectively.

K-State was able to take early leads in every game but it seemed to run out of gas midway through the third game. Leading 3-1 and then 4-3 in the third match, the 'Cats gave up six straight points and the 'Huskers never looked back.

The Wildcats again threatened in the fourth game, taking a 3-1 lead, but Nebraska gained a 5-3 lead and then had runs of three, four and three points to win the game 15-4.

"Obviously I was not pleased with the loss," said Wildcat Head Coach Scott Nelson. "But I was definitely pleased with our performance. We played with a lot of intensity tonight."

"We played a very, very solid volleyball team here tonight," Nelson added. "It would have been a real quick match if we hadn't raised our intensity level like we did."

The match lasted almost two hours as compared with the 42-minute match played in Lincoln by the teams earlier this season. According to Nelson, the difference in the match was the excellent conditioning of the Nebraska squad.

"I think the length of the match is indicative of good, aggressive play," Nelson said. "There were a lot of side outs and that tends to wear on you."

"Physically, we were tired in the fourth match," Nelson added. "We've found that we can play at that level, the problem is that they can play longer at that level than we can."

Wildcat team captain Kristi Jacquot, who entered the game ranked seventh in the nation in service aces at 0.86 per game, had three aces in the four games to increase her season total. Teammate Shawnee Call, 13th and 16th respectively in digs and kills, scored 10 digs and 22 kills in the four games.

Nelson said sophomore Kristin Martin and senior Kelley Carlson also played well.

"Kristin runs our offense for us and she really made some smart set selections for us tonight," Nelson said. "Kelley Carlson's defense was just outstanding. We don't usually ask her to contribute to the defense that much, but she really dug a lot of shots for us tonight."

On defense the 'Cats were led by Mary Kinsey who had 14 digs. Valerie Kastens and Carlson tied for third best behind Call with eight digs apiece. Kinsey and Kastens both added eight kills apiece to aid the K-State offensive effort.

"Nebraska was extremely tough. They just don't give you a break mentally. They just keep coming at you," Nelson said.

The loss drops the Wildcats to 17-8 overall and 5-5 in the Big Eight while Nebraska improves to 24-1 and 10-0.

The Wildcats will be idle for the next ten days before taking on Missouri in another Big Eight Conference match, Nov. 13 at 7:30 p.m. in Ahearn Field House. The Oklahoma volleyball match, which was scheduled for Nov. 14, has been moved to Nov. 15 at 1:30 p.m., also in Ahearn.

Classy pride

Dear Editor,

We are about to embark on a most exciting week at K-State. Naturally, there is plenty of excitement in the air with the impending visit by our cross-state rivals, the Kansas Jayhawks.

However, more than that, we are also in the process of celebrating our Purple Pride and some of the people who have enhanced it along the way. Saturday will be Purple Pride Day in KSU Stadium as we retire jersey No. 11 in honor of Lynn Dickey and Steve Grogan. Joining us for the occasion will be the one and only Vince Gibson — the man who coined the "Purple Pride" phrase.

It is always great to recognize those who have been important to K-State through the years. This week will be particularly gratifying in that regard.

As the game proceeds this Saturday, let's do our very best to show the entire country what Purple Pride means. Many eyes will be focused on us this weekend; let's make sure we present ourselves and K-State with the class they both deserve.

Right to brag

Dear K-State Fan,

I want to encourage you to attend our game against the University of Kansas this Saturday. A victory will be a big boost for our football program and give K-Staters another year of bragging rights over the Jayhawks!

Our team needs and deserves support and I'm confident an abundance of vocal encouragement. I would, however, ask you to show restraint by not encroaching the sideline or playing field during the game. Also, for those planning on celebrating in Aggieville, please temper your post-

Rivalry deserves attention

Mid-Week Commentary

PERRIN
Sports Writer

Maybe it's just me, but it sure seems like there's a lot less excitement this year than usual about the K-State-Kansas football game.

Granted, Saturday's game at KSU Stadium is a matchup of two teams with a combined record of 1-15. And granted, little more than bragging rights and avoiding the Big Eight Conference cellar are at stake.

Just about the only thing saving the game from total insignificance (aside from being the likely Bottom Ten "crummy game of the week") is the rivalry. That rivalry, one of the most intense anywhere, is what makes K-State-KU worth buying a ticket to watch.

Wildcat Coach Stan Parrish has made no secret of the importance he places on the KU game and makes it his No. 1 priority win of the year. In fact, KU baiting has been among Parrish's favorite hobbies for the past two years. A few weeks ago Parrish even said, "If we have 11 (players) left, we can have a chance against Kansas."

KU Coach Bob Valesente, who may be job hunting if he can't beat either K-State or Missouri this year, downplayed the intrastate rivalry last year and paid for it with a 29-12 loss at Manhattan.

This year Valesente is determined not to make the same mistake, saying, "Stan has given us enough bulletin-board material to take care of us for several years," and "I don't give a damn what Parrish thinks."

Hype aside, these two men simply don't appear to like each other very much.

The rivalry between fans in the stands can be even more fun to watch. Seeing the pseudo-elitist KU backers in the end zone seats turn their noses up when the K-State student section strikes up the "Rock-chalk Chickenhawk..." chant is always a good time.

Watching those same Jayhawk fans complain all the way to their cars after watching a K-State victory isn't bad for laughs either. Hey, there's nobody more fun for a Wildcat fan to humiliate than someone from KU.

Comparing the two teams from any kind of standpoint isn't easy, because neither K-State nor KU has done anything particularly distinguishing on either offense or defense all year long. Both teams have said they would try to establish the running and passing games at different points in the year and subsequently failed to do so. Both teams are giving up points in bunches.

The teams have only two common opponents — Oklahoma and Nebraska. The No. 1 Sooners smashed KU 71-10 and K-State 59-10 while the No. 2 Cornhuskers dismantled the Jayhawks 54-2 and the Wildcats 56-3. While the scores look strikingly similar, most Nebraska and Oklahoma players said they thought K-State was the better team because of superior on-field effort.

About the only trend worth mentioning is that the home team in this series has won 10 times in a row.

Final score prediction: K-State 24, KU 17. The home-field advantage ought to be enough to pull the 'Cats through.

Commissioners crack down on bar owners

By Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

City commissioners gave final approval Tuesday to an ordinance cracking down on the sale of alcoholic beverages to minors.

Under the ordinance, 30 or more arrests of minors in possession of or consuming alcohol on a bar's premises within one year is "grounds for revocation" of the bar owner's license, said City Attorney William Frost.

A license would not automatically be revoked, he said. A bar owner would have a hearing before the City Commission, and the commission would decide after that hearing if the license should be revoked.

"For the vast majority of bar owners, 30 is triple what they would expect to occur. For others, it is 25 percent of what they would expect to occur," Frost said.

Frost also told commissioners that 30 or more convictions within a year would be grounds for revocation of a license even if a bar owner did not know alcohol was being purchased or consumed by minors.

The Kansas Supreme Court requires proof that a bar owner knew they were selling to a minor in criminal cases, Frost said.

"But, that requirement doesn't apply to the regulation of licenses," he said.

"This ordinance says it's up to bar owners to put on all the controls they can to minimize the amount of violations," Frost said.

In other business, commissioners dealt with the spillover from limited campus parking.

The commission voted to block off half of the parking lot for the Girl Scout Little House, 321 Sunset Ave., for use by those attending meetings or working there.

Commissioner Richard Hayter challenged the need to deny students who live in fraternities and sororities nearby the use of half of the public parking lot.

"I'm not sure I can support a measure which blocks off half that lot to relatively sporadic use," Hayter said.

Karen Walker, field director for the Kaw Valley area of the Girl Scouts, said the Little House is the site, on average, for 49 meetings a month.

"Our main concern is with our leaders and our girls at our evening meetings," Walker said.

Walker told commissioners that adults attending meetings at Little House often have to walk a long distance back to their cars in the dark.

"We don't feel that it is a safe situation," Walker said.

Hayter said parking in the Little House lot was part of the larger problem of campus parking.

"That whole area is an overflow parking problem," Hayter said. "I think we have to realize the students are an asset to the community. I have a problem with locking up that many spots to parking for Little House."

Commissioners also gave final approval to an ordinance regulating dangerous dogs.

Mayor Gene Klingler disliked the portion of the ordinance that states a dog is dangerous only if it attacks an individual.

"How does this keep the pup from getting a free bite?" Klingler asked Frost, who drafted the ordinance for the commission.

"Without that unprovoked attack, it would be difficult to show that animal is a dangerous dog," Frost said.

Only a "breed-specific" ordinance banning certain types of dogs from the city would define a dog as dangerous before any attack, Frost said.

result of the crash.

"With this game, you couldn't really react to things like that (the crash)," he said.

Most of the teams have sold everything since the crash, Sanderson said. The teams sold the stock at a loss so they won't lose anymore. Most students are keeping any remaining stocks and waiting to see how the market prices will change. Sanderson said buying and selling is too risky now.

Although Swan said he really didn't know that much about the stock market until this year, he has started reading The Wall Street Journal.

"After awhile, (the newspaper's) pretty easy to catch on to. Most of the class can read it now," he said.

1 medium-size spaghetti squash, peeled, seeded and very finely chopped

1 1/2 cups water
1 1/2 cups granulated sugar
1/4 teaspoon nutmeg

Juice and zest (the thin outer skin of the fruit, with none of the bitter white underskin included) of 2 small or 1 large lemon

1/2 cup sour cream
1 ready-made pie crust

Whipped cream or sour cream, sweetened with maple syrup

Directions: Preheat oven to 425 degrees.

Boil the squash in water for 10 minutes. Mix in the sugar, nutmeg, lemon juice and zest and, finally, the sour cream. Pour the filling into the pie crust and bake for 20 minutes in the preheated oven, then lower the heat to 350 and bake 1 1/2 hours longer. The pie is done when the filling has thickened and the squash is tender. Serve at room temperature with whipped or sour cream.

Thought-provoking yet pleasing films

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

Anyone interested in film-making, art, music, photography or the offbeat can find what they are looking for in "A Night of Classic and Experimental Films" now showing at 7:30 tonight and Thursday in Union Forum Hall and 3:30 Thursday afternoon in the Union Little Theatre.

Eleven short films from around the world are featured in one thought-provoking presentation.

Films included are: "Frank Film," "The Family That Dwelt Apart," "La Femme Fleur," "Begone Dull Care," "Time Piece," "Pas de Deux," "The Critic," "Clay: The Origin of the Species," "An American Time Capsule," "Vicious Cycles" and "The Violinist."

11 offbeat films challenge viewers

Movie Review

"The Critic," a four-minute Academy Award winner placed in the middle of the presentation, provides a brief respite from serious thoughts and earnest attempts at interpretation by poking fun at avant garde cinema; indeed, by poking fun at the films preceeding and following itself

Mel Brooks plays the part of an unseen member of the audience who is sure the film is "dirty" and he has wasted his "two bucks."

After laughing with Brooks, it is clear that not all symbols have meaning, but the other films cannot be merely laughed off.

"Frank Film," another Academy Award winner, inundates the viewer with continuous pictures of life in a middle-class American family, taken from advertisements for consumer products.

"The Family That Dwelt Apart" was written and narrated by E.B. White, who is well known as the writer of "Charlotte's Webb". The animated film is about a family living happily by itself on an island until the family is done in by do-gooders.

This tragic tale of modern life invading the simpler ways of the past is captured in humorous animation and told in a matter-of-fact manner, so that it seems almost to be a comedy.

"La Femme Fleur," a French film, is about "woman."

"It doesn't matter who the magician is if he knows how to play her," and "A woman's sleep is richer than any museum," the commentator says.

The film features artists such as Gustav Klimt and Aubrey Beardsley from the Art Nouveau period and their obsessive view of "woman."

"Begone Dull Care" seems at first to be the kind of film Brooks would call garbage, but it is worth it to keep watching. The viewer may think, "So this is what music looks like," or "So this is what images sound like."

A deaf person watching the lights and colors might experience the same feelings as a blind person listening to the music. The music and the images on the screen seem to blend together until neither can be thought of as independent.

Muppet creator Jim Henson is the director and star of "Time Piece," a funny look at one man's struggle to survive in today's crazy world.

The average man's reaction to life is supremely characterized by Henson's "Help" as he is flushed down the toilet.

"Clay: The Origin of the Species" is a loosely woven tale of evolution told by clay figures which was done at Harvard University.

These films may be short, but they pack more meaning in a few minutes than many two-hour films being shown in the theaters.

Lubbers, Taylor win, ready for run-off 60-vote margin 'not too much,' Lubbers believes

By The Collegian Staff

The next week will be one of "heavy campaigning" for Troy Lubbers, junior in marketing and finalist in the race for student body president.

After receiving notification from the election committee about 8:15 p.m. Wednesday that he was in the run-off, Lubbers said the 60-vote margin separating him from Jack

Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, wouldn't be too much to make up.

Lubbers received 732 votes, and Taylor garnered 790. Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics, captured 594 votes and Monte Couchman, sophomore in seconddary education, tallied 313 as a write-in candidate in the race for student body president.

Lubbers said the run-off is going to be enjoyable because of the good working relationship he and Taylor have developed on the student body president's cabinet this year.

"It's going to be fun," Lubbers said in a phone conversation with Taylor shortly after the results were announced. "I'm ready for it."

This election will be tougher than the general election, Lubbers said, because traditionally, fewer people vote in the run-off.

"I'm going to talk to everybody I know and get them to talk to everybody they know — a lot of personal contact," he said.

In the coming week, Lubbers said he would emphasize to voters his state-level experience in working with the Kansas Board of Regents and the University administration.

The candidates stood fairly evenly regarding their platforms, and there were no "really big" issues, he said. Holton Hall was controversial, but it was essentially resolved before the campaign began, Lubbers said.

Lubbers said the campaign for student body president was a tough one because there were four good candidates.

Taylor predicts close final battle

By The Collegian Staff

Jack Taylor was almost speechless when the news that he was one of the run-off candidates for student body president reached him shortly after 8 p.m. Wednesday.

"I'm pretty excited," Taylor yelled, after a long pause to collect his thoughts.

"I've been very optimistic all along.... I just thank God that I'm here," Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, said in front of a room filled with his fraternity brothers at the Delta Sigma Phi house.

Taylor was surprised the election results came so early.

"We just got out of chapter, and all of a sudden I get this phone call," he said.

Taylor said he has not made too many plans for the run-off except to get students out to vote.

"We need the people to get out and vote; like I said, it's their student government," he said.

Taylor predicted the run-off with Troy Lubbers, junior in business, would be difficult.

"I think it (the run-off) is going to be tough. I wouldn't take anything away from Troy. He's got all of his oars in the water. I really have a lot of respect for him," Taylor said.

Taylor said he has a lot of respect for the other candidates as well. "The four of us (candidates) got Jack Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, celebrates at the Delta Sigma Phi fraternity house shortly after he received word that he will be in a run-off with Troy Lubbers.

to be really good friends," he said. "We talked a lot — not about the issues — but we got to be really close."

Taylor said he believed the controvery surrounding an advertisement for Pat Muir, in which several individuals who appeared in a pro-Muir ad said they didn't want their names in print, did affect his own campaign. "I'm not sure that I picked up any votes from it, but it definitely did affect my campaign," Taylor said. "It's really unfortunate."

Senate demonstrates moderate independence with past decisions

By Alison Neely
Staff Writer

Over the years, Student Senate has taken a variety of positions on those issues that have come before it. At times, Senate has been a mouthpiece for the administration. At other times, however, a sharp contrast was evident between what the administration wanted and Senate's decisions.

One element pervasive throughout all important Senate decisions is that the administration, if it is patient, can usually do or get whatever it wants — with or without the help of Senate.

News Analysis

With each Senate election comes a relatively new group of senators and a new student body president. Steven Johnson, student body president in 1986-1987, proposed a bill that passed in Senate allowing the president to serve two terms.

During the same time period, a bill passed that changed Senate elections to the fall semester, thereby affording the president extra time to adjust to the position and become acquainted with Board of Regents members. Also, senators have been given time to adjust to their positions before the April budget allocations.

Traditionally, both the president and Senate have taken office in late February, and it was hoped that this reorganization would create a continuity in the issues of importance and communication between the administration and Senate.

Holton Hall

A prime example of the need for increased communication is Holton Hall. In 1981, a heroic effort was made to save Holton from demolition. At the time, the administration was in favor of razing it to build a newer, more modern facility. However, because the student attitude favored renovating the older buildings, Senate challenged the decision and ultimately took on the project.

Much controversy has arisen recently due to changes in the original plans, and the initial commitment of $780,000 is not sufficient to complete the renovation. Inflation coupled with state safety codes not included in the original estimate caused the cost increase.

When faced with the prospect of either abandoning the project or meeting the new financial requirement of $1.069 million, Senate voted to stand by its original commitment. Senate felt compelled to finish the project and the belief among senators was to do the job right — if it was to be done at all.

"We felt that the '82-'83 Senate had made a commitment. Also there was concern for the people who had already paid into the fund for four years," said Charlene Nichols, junior in journalism and mass communications and member of the Senate Executive Committee.

Allowing the students to vote on the issue was clearly out of the question. The sheer volume of information prevented the Senate from fully understanding all of the complications for more than six months. With no resources available to educate the student body, a vote would have been useless, Nichols said.

Information about the cost of Holton Hall came only from the administration, two University employees currently housed in Holton and the University architect. No exact amount was specified in the original bill. A rough estimate of $780,000 was drawn from the information.

When it became clear the original amount would not be sufficient, it was this same administration that told Senate it could not find any available funds to pay the difference in renovation costs.

Senate's independence

Counter to the Holton situation of serving as a "mouthpiece" are the times when Senate has taken action on an issue independently.

In November 1986, Senate released a letter to all Kansas newspapers assuring the public that the Aggieville disturbance, which took place one month prior, was not the sole responsibility of K-State students, nor was it condoned. Of its own volition, Senate acted on the situation as the administration was undecided about the course of action to be taken. Senate passed a

Speaker: Women still lack equal salaries

By Debbie Lyons
Collegian Reporter

Women with a high school or college degree earn 44 percent less than men with the same degree, according to Christel Marquardt, president of the Kansas Bar Association. Marquardt, the first female president of the Bar, addressed a group of more than 80 people Wednesday evening. Joe Knopp, majority leader of the Kansas House of Representatives, R-Manhattan, provided responses to Marquardt's speech.

"It's unfair that we (women) have to claw our way up to equality that we should have had all along," Marquardt said.

Knopp said the barriers that exist for women are self-imposed and the ones that were in place in former years "don't seem to be there now."

"Demographically, politics has opened up to women," Knopp said, pointing out that 28 women serve in the 125-member Kansas House, which is up significantly from just a few years ago.

Marquardt said women make up 59 percent of the American population older than 65. Women in this age group earn a median salary of

Historian to lecture today

By The Collegian Staff

A Pulitzer Prize-winning historian will deliver the second All-University Convocation at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Michael Kammen, professor of history at Cornell University, will be speaking on "Personal Liberty and the Constitution."

Convocation Lecture Series Coordinator Cornelia Flora said Kammen will trace the changes in the development of American liberty, from the Revolutionary era to the Civil War and to the 20th century, in his address.

Kammen is the author of the book "Spheres of Liberty: Changing Perceptions of Liberty in American Culture."

Kammen's address is open to the public.

The final Convocation of the fall semester is Nov. 17. Noam Chomsky, fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, will discuss the Iran-Contra scandal at 7:30 p.m. in McCain.

Recruits given secret tests

WASHINGTON — Women police recruits were secretly given pregnancy tests over the last two years using urine samples they provided for routine drug screening, The Washington Post reported Thursday.

According to the newspaper, the testing began in November 1985 as part of an unwritten policy. District of Columbia police could not say how many women were tested, nor was it clear whether any women had been denied a position because of a positive test result, the Post reported.

The pregnancy tests were administered using urine samples that were provided for drug screening at the Police and Fire Clinic in the district, the paper said. Recruits were aware of the drug tests, but not the pregnancy tests.

The tests were halted this week after a female employee of the clinic complained that they were an invasion of privacy and demanded to see the policy in writing.

District law prohibits discriminating against women because of pregnancy.

"However, we will defer you until the completion of your pregnancy," said Capt. Max P.T. Sachs, the department's personnel officer. "Wouldn't you want to know whether you're pregnant before you become a police officer?"

Reagan vows to maintain SDI

WASHINGTON — President Reagan vowed Wednesday that a nuclear arms treaty with the Soviet Union will not undercut the U.S. commitment to the security of Europe, saying the stationing of 300,000 American troops abroad and "our steadfast nuclear guarantee underscore this pledge."

Reagan also said it was "totally unacceptable" for the Soviet Union to try to link reductions in globe-girdling strategic nuclear weapons to restrictions on his "Star Wars" missile defense plan, also known as the Strategic Defense Initiative, SDI.

"We won't bargain away SDI," Reagan said in a speech a month before Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev arrives in Washington for a superpower summit. The two leaders are expected to sign a treaty banning intermediate-range nuclear forces (INF) in Europe and to discuss other arms differences.

Last Friday, Reagan said Gorbachev was not making SDI concessions a condition for cutbacks in strategic arms.

Iranians speak against America

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran said millions marched in its cities Wednesday, chanting "Death to America!" on the eighth anniversary of the day a mob stormed the U.S. Embassy and seized hostages, who spent 444 days in captivity.

Hashemi Rafsanjani, speaker of the parliament, declared a week of mobilization to "confront American aggression."

State television showed disabled veterans of the 7-year-old war with Iraq in wheelchairs, holding banners aloft that read: "This is proof of U.S. crimes."

Soldiers dragged American flags through the streets and set them ablaze while bystanders chanted and jabbed their fists into the air.

Tehran radio said a bomb killed two people and wounded 26 during a rally in Mahabad, northwest Iran, and said "American mercenary agents" were responsible.

Strollers: 'Run'away success

YAKIMA, Wash. — In the booming business of equipping the Baby Boomers, a company that makes baby strollers for joggers is a runaway success.

The children of Prince Charles and Princess Di, Billy Joel and Christie Brinkley, and Sports Illustrated swimsuit covergirl Kim Alexis all have one of Phil Baechler's Baby Jogger strollers.

Baechler, a 39-year-old former newspaperman, invented the lightweight, three-wheeled stroller five years ago because the avid runner hated to leave his son Travis at home during workouts.

The solution was to take him along in the aluminum-framed cart fitted with nylon seats and 20-inch bicycle wheels.

"Our customers are affluent, the prototype yuppies," said Mary Baechler, 31, the inventor's wife and president of Racing Strollers Inc.

The strollers allow customers to combine the yuppie passions for fitness and family, she said.

"You have couples that ran before and then kids came along and that put a damper on exercise," she said.

The strollers are handmade at a modest garage-turned-shop. Despite a price of $240 per stroller, or $320 for one that holds twins, sales for the once-struggling company are doubling each

Liquor permits create conflict

TOPEKA — Although a state official said his agency does not expect an unmanageable problem with them, a lawmaker who owns a catering business complained today that allowing the state to issue temporary liquor permits is a "horrible mistake."

Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, said the practice of allowing individuals or groups to get a temporary license to sell liquor by the drink could lead to abuses and hurt established businesses like his.

Under legislation passed during the Legislature's 1987 regular session, a person or group can apply for a license to sell liquor by the drink at an event for up to three days, with a limit of four events per year. Secretary of Revenue Harley Duncan said the state has issued 38 permits since July 1, when the law went into effect.

"I think we made a horrible mistake when we allowed individuals to do this," Vidricksen told his colleagues on the Legislature's study Committee on Federal and State Affairs.

Thatcher enjoys shopping

LONDON — Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher admonished a Spanish tourist who curtsied to her Wednesday during a two-hour shopping tour in one of London's biggest department stores.

"You don't do that to me, my dear. I'm only in politics," she told Josefa Pagarolas Morell, referring to the practice of only curtsying to members of the royal family.

Thatcher signed an autograph for Morell, then wandered through Marks and Spencer's Marble Arch store.

The prime minister bought about $25 worth of goods, including five musical Christmas stockings, flower-patterned bed linens, a basket of cosmetics, two silk blouses and a sweater.

She also disclosed that she can't resist chocolates when the box is open. "They somehow beg to be eaten," she said.

Vietnam remembered

Charles Garrison, a Vietnam veteran, lectured Wednesday evening in Derby Food Center. The question and answer informational meeting was sponsored by the Vietnam Memorial Committee.

Veterans relate experiences

By Michelle Engemann
Collegian Reporter

Charles Garrison had to stop several times to regain control of his voice Wednesday evening as he told about shooting an 8-year-old boy. The youngster had thrown a grenade into a jeep, killing two of Garrison's buddies as he watched. Garrison, John T. Bonacorda and Bill Arck talked to about 25 students about their experiences in Vietnam and answered many questions during an informational meeting sponsored by the Vietnam Memorial Committee.

Bonacorda, Garrison and Arck said they all believed in the war, but not in the way it was handled. "We went to help the Vietnamese stay free — you can bring it down to helping a buddy on the street who is getting attacked," Bonacorda said.

Garrison said American troops were not prepared for the type of warfare they encountered. He said he received one week of training in guerrilla warfare but wasn't exposed to a jungle-type environment until arriving in Vietnam. "By the time training was set up and people were learning how to fight, the war was up," Bonacorda said.

"We went to help the Vietnamese stay free."
—John T. Bonacorda

All three agreed on the many reasons returning veterans experienced post-dramatic stress disorder (PTSD), including hostility from people in the United States. "If the family you left was there when you got back, it was a lot better," Bonacorda said.

Bonacorda got married two weeks after returning and remained in the service, which he felt served as a support system. The veterans discussed the impact and effectiveness of movies such as "Platoon" and "Full Metal Jacket" in dealing with what happened in Vietnam. Garrison said "Platoon" did a good job of portraying Vietnam. "It showed the alcoholics and the druggies," he said. "Some people had to find ways to keep sane." Bonacorda said movies give the unfair impression that everyone was an alcoholic or on drugs. "The same people who were a little crazy over there were probably the same ones who would have the cops chasing them here for killing somebody," Bonacorda said.

Bonacorda, senior in business administration, served as a helicopter crew chief in the Army in 1967. Arck, director of the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service and adviser of K-State's Vietnam Memorial committee, served as an intelligence analyst for the Air Force from 1971-75. Garrison, who is serving in the Army, was an infantryman and was transferred from Germany to Vietnam in 1971.

New budget director chosen

By The Collegian Staff

K-State has appointed John Struve as director of budget. He will assume the position Dec. 14.

Struve comes from Wayne State College in Nebraska, where he has worked in progressively responsible positions since 1969. He has been vice president for finance since July 1986 at Wayne State.

K-State's budget director position has been vacant since June 1987 when Thomas Schellhardt was promoted to assistant vice president for administration and finance.

Struve will be responsible for preparing and monitoring the University's annual budget and for the preparation of the University's legislative requests submitted to the Kansas Board of Regents and the state budget division. Also, he will assist in the defense of the request as it is reviewed by the governor and the Kansas Legislature.

Other major responsibilities, Schellhardt said, include participating in the University's strategic planning process and preparing support material to be used by academic administrators. The material will help the administrators request and manage budgets.

At Wayne State, Struve has been responsible for budget request guideline development, preparation and defense of budgets at Board of Trustees and legislative levels, and the allocation of all college funds.

At Wayne State, Struve has served as director, dean of finance, business manager and business office assistant. He also has been an examiner and auditor of public accounts for Lincoln, Neb.

KDHE fines company $1,500

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Department of Health and Environment has fined a Kansas City, Mo., company $1,500 for violations of state asbestos removal regulations, the agency announced Wednesday.

Elliott Drywall and Asbestos was ordered to pay fine because of a July 28 incident at Washington High School in Kansas City, Kan. The company had been hired to remove asbestos from the school, but KDHE staff members said that during an inspection they found asbestos in the boiler room and that work areas had not been thoroughly cleaned.

Asbestos has been linked to a lung disorder. The contaminated areas in the school were later cleaned and properly sealed by the company, according to the health agency.

The order assessing the fine can be appealed to Stanley Grant, secretary of health and environment.

United States, Soviets need to agree on treaty

The signing of a treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union to eliminate intermediate and short range nuclear missiles, which is expected to occur when Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev meets President Reagan in Washington D.C. on Dec. 7, will create greater stability in the relationship between the two nuclear powers.

These weapons were first added to the NATO arsenal during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. The addition of these weapons continued the American commitment to use nuclear force to counter a possible Warsaw Pact assault on western Europe with vastly superior conventional forces. The Warsaw Pact is a mutual defense alliance composed of the Soviet Union and its eastern European allies.

At that time, Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara claimed the provision of intermediate and short range nuclear weapons gave the American president — who was and is the only person who may authorize use of the NATO nuclear deterrent — what McNamara called a "flexible response capability."

Until that time, the nuclear defense of Western Europe could only have been carried out through the massive delivery of hundreds of nuclear weapons via long-range missiles based in the United States or dropped by bombers based in North America and Europe.

As McNamara's thinking went, instead of engaging in massive retaliation, the president could use smaller weapons to demonstrate to the Soviets our willingness to do whatever was necessary to defend our European allies. Or to cut down the number of Warsaw Pact troops in order to even things out between the two sides in the ensuing conventional conflict.

Of course, the acquisition of such weapons by NATO led the Warsaw Pact to obtain its own shorter-range weapons, creating for the Soviets their own flexible response capability.

McNamara's reasoning and that of his opposites in the Soviet defense establishment ignored one simple and frightening possibility.

The recipient of the first nuclear blow would probably respond in kind, creating an atomic tit-for-tat that would escalate into a full-scale nuclear war. Eventually, it would end when no one would be left alive to press a button.

Also, the doctrine of flexible response created the possibility of an opponent ignoring the theater-level response — which contains the conflict within a defined area — and initiating a full-scale strike instead. As an example, the United States might use intermediate-range nuclear weapons in an attempt to deter a Warsaw Pact attack, but the Soviet Union might decide to try to wipe out the entire U.S. nuclear strike capability with one massive strike — thus winning a quick and nasty war.

Intermediate and short range weapons have the potential to create a dangerous perception in the minds of decision makers. They offer officials the illusion that a nuclear exchange could be engaged in without the risk of starting a global nuclear war.

These missiles create the possibility of miscalculation by the leaders on both sides, and they do not enhance stability in the relationship between the superpowers.

The elimination of these weapons will reduce miscalculation, enhance stability, and reduce the risk of nuclear war. It's about time.

Leaders ask for responsibility

Post-game disturbance must stop

To K-State Students,

The K-State-University of Kansas football game has long been the staging ground for the best party of the year! We need your help to make sure this year's event results in a good time for all.

Since last year's "Aggieville Riot," merchants, city and University officials, University students and law enforcement agencies have been meeting to cooperatively establish guidelines geared to ensuring the safety of participants and deter destruction in and around Aggieville. We want you to know what is planned so that there won't be any surprises.

■ There will be no vehicular traffic allowed into Aggieville on game day, and pedestrian access to the area will be limited by fencing around the entire area.

■ If Aggieville becomes too crowded, people will be let into the core area on a one-in, one-out basis by private security personnel hired by the Aggieville merchants.

■ Additionally, the security personnel will be patrolling the roof tops, as the roof tops will be off limits.

■ Only those 18 or older will be allowed in Aggieville, and no one will be permitted to carry bottles or cans into the area.

■ The Aggieville area and outlying areas, including fraternities, sororities and private parties, will be policed.

We are concerned, as we think most students are, about the image K-State received following last year's disturbance. While there were a number of people involved in that "riot" who were not K-State or KU students, the fact remains that Aggieville is associated with K-State. So, it is up to K-State students to put an end to the "riot" and the negative image we received.

Thanks for your help!

Kent Bradley
student body president,
and Michelle Benoit
Student Senate chairwoman

To the students of K-State and the University of Kansas:

We, the president of K-State and the chancellor of KU, are concerned. The destructive behavior following the most recent football games with our two universities has projected a negative image of our students and, indeed, of our universities.

Establishing reputations for academic excellence takes many years of dedicated service by faculty, careful planning by administrators, commitment from resources from the state and contributions from alumni, both as students in the classroom and as citizens and professionals following graduation. Our two universities have worked to earn our current reputations for excellence.

Reputations, however, are fragile things. They can easily be damaged, as by the riots associated with the celebrations following our most recent game in Manhattan. Any repetition of that behavior would do further damage to our reputations and could conceivably handicap future graduates as they work to begin their professional careers.

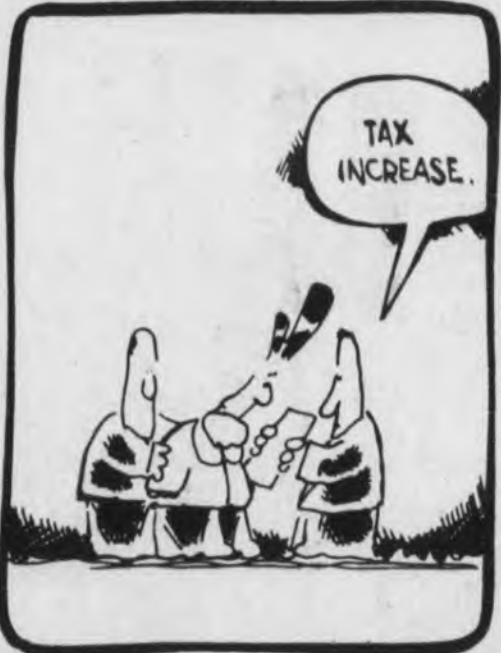

None of us — students, faculty or administrators — can tolerate situations which jeopardize the personal safety and physical well-being of students and bystanders. We cannot condone action which results in damage to personal property. We cannot stand by silently and allow a few irresponsible individuals to damage the reputations of two proud universities and their athletic programs.

Therefore, we ask the students of both universities to work together so that the events of game day return to our traditional spirit of neighborly competitiveness and celebration. That is the spirit our rivalry has demonstrated through the years. It is the spirit which should be shown now.

K-State and KU are your universities. You have an important stake in ensuring that their reputations are maintained at the highest level.

We appreciate your support.

Sincerely,
Jon Wefald
K-State President and Gene Budig
KU Chancellor

Voter non-participation in election appalling

With the exception of the student body president's race, student elections are over for another year. And everyone who ran, regardless of whether they emerged victorious, is to be commended.

In an age of non-participation and apathy, the group of mostly enthusiastic and well-qualified candidates was refreshing. Students, for the most part, were presented with solid choices.

Unfortunately, far too many students ignored both those solid choices and their responsibility by refusing to vote. The number of voters who turned out is appalling.

Fewer than 2,600 students filled out a ballot, which equates with less than 15 percent of the student body.

Fifteen percent.
The question now is: Why was the turnout so paltry? At least two reasons probably affected the turnout: the change of elections from the spring to the fall and the lack of a controversial referendum.

Unlike last year, when the athletic fee referendum dominated discussion, no single issue drew voters to the polls en masse this year. The most significant controversy of the year, Senate's decision to grant additional funding to the Holton Hall renovation project, was resolved before campaigning even began.

Last year, about 3,800 students voted, and the athletic fee referendum was credited with bringing them out.

Secondly, countless students were undoubtedly taken by surprise when elections were moved from the spring to the fall. However, an adequate educational campaign should have been enough to jolt them into reality. And if that didn't work, the colorful — and sometimes ugly — campaign signs strapped to nearly every tree on campus should have.

Nonetheless, for whatever reason, students just didn't vote in this election, and it's too late to change that now. But it's not too late for students to realize the importance of the election next Wednesday to determine the student body president.

All those students who voted this time should do it again.

And all those who didn't vote should ask themselves why.

Not a good idea

Editor,

The Kansas Board of Regents is currently considering making the admissions policy selective at the state universities. Under the current open admissions policy, all graduates of Kansas high schools are admitted to the six state universities, regardless of grades or test scores.

I see many problems with this idea, one of which little has been said. I'm concerned about the impact on the community colleges and other institutions not included in the policy.

The community colleges have worked hard to build up their programs and reputations. If the selective admissions policy came into effect, these schools would not only become overcrowded, they would be hurt in other ways. Students need to select a university to fit their own personalities and needs, and many students would attend another school because of rejection by the universities. Part of the students would not want to be there and part would, thus creating a poor atmosphere. A stigma of being academically inferior would develop in these schools. I feel this is very unfair to these excellent learning institutions, and that this policy is not in the best interest of education in Kansas.

Negligence prolem

Editor,

In response to the article concerning the lack of fire alarms in Farrell Library, "Federal Standards for Fire Protection Lacking in Farrell," in the Oct. 26, 1987 Collegian, I would like to add some comments. There are 18 buildings on this campus that have no type of fire alarm system and only a few of these buildings have smoke detectors, according to John Lambert, K-State University's Public Safety Director.

Of these 18 buildings, all are state owned and none pass the state's own fire codes. This is an outrage! Taxpayer's money is being used to beautify campuses and create better transportation, which is great, but shouldn't we concern ourselves with the safety of these taxpayers — the students? It is the University's and the State's responsibility to protect and serve their residents and clients — the students, faculty and staff of K-State. Something must be done now to remedy this problem before somebody pays for this negligence with their life.

Respect cabbies

Editor,

Re: "French cabbies' device shocking,"

Nov. 4 Collegian.

Judd Annis, your column about French cabbies is a gross injustice to cab drivers. I am a retired cab driver, and I lived in constant fear during the 40 years that I drove my cab, Old Buttercup. You obviously don't realize what it's like to be driving a cab at 3 a.m. in six inches of snow and worrying about who will mug you next. I say it is about time that people became concerned about the safety of cab drivers. Annis (no pun intended), your article lacked clear thinking, and I don't think I could agree with you even in arguing for sliced bread. I have been reading your spineless articles all semester, and I think that you should write about more important topics, such as admissions policies, student government elections and the stock market. Annis, the world is a changing, moving place, and it is time you started moving with it.

Parents Day traditional 650 anticipated to attend buffet

By The Collegian Staff

This weekend is Parents Weekend at K-State. In recognition of mothers and fathers, the University will continue its Parents Day tradition by sponsoring an array of activities, including buffets and entertainment.

An evening buffet will start at 5 p.m. in the Union South Stateroom following K-State's football game with its intrastate rival, the University of Kansas.

Preparations for the buffet have been going on all week, said Jack Connaughton, assistant director of the Union. About 30 employees have been helping prepare the meats, salads and baked goods on the menu.

The buffet, which has been sold out for a couple of weeks, will be attended by 650 parents and students, he said.

"We always seem to get a good response each year," Connaughton said.

However, he said this number is relatively small compared to past years because of the location of the buffet.

"We usually have it in the Ballroom, which allows room for more people, but this year another group reserved the Ballroom before us," he said.

"There will be white tablecloths and decorative tables to make the atmosphere nice for the parents."

—Malley Sisson

Student food service employees will be serving the evening buffet, he said.

"There will be white tablecloths and decorative tables to make the atmosphere nice for the parents," said Malley Sisson, food coordinator for Union Food Services.

During the meal, there will be a string quartet playing in the buffet area, Connaughton said.

For those who didn't get to buy a ticket for the evening buffet, a pre-game buffet from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Bluemont room will be open for any parents or students who wish to attend, Connaughton said.

After dinner, Edward Jackman, a juggler and comedian, will perform at 7:30 p.m. in Forum Hall.

Parents Weekend, rivalry sells tickets

By The Collegian Staff

Parents Weekend tickets for K-State's game with the University of Kansas on Saturday are "selling very well," said Carol Adolph, administrative assistant of intercollegiate athletics.

"Parents Day is always a good sale for us," Adolph said. "The K-State-KU game, especially, attracts a lot of interest."

Adolph said Parents Weekend was not intentionally scheduled for the day of the K-State-KU game to curb any rioting trouble.

Parents Weekend was scheduled for this weekend because it was the only weekend available, she said. The other home-game weekends had different events already scheduled, like homecoming and Fort Riley Day.

"If we had not had the game this weekend we could have only scheduled it (Parents Weekend) for late in November, and we didn't want to wait that long," Adolph said.

Living in changing times

Sociologist discusses family lives

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

Families are changing and society is affected by these changes, said Joan Aldous, a K-State graduate and a professor at the University of Notre Dame.

Aldous, who has a doctorate in sociology, discussed "Family Lives in Times of Change" at the 1987 Ruth Hoeftin Forum on Family Issues. Nearly 200 visitors, faculty and staff attended the discussion Wednesday morning in Forum Hall.

Aldous said the '80s are the "best of times" and the "worst of times" for families, depending on the type of family.

Those experiencing the "best of times," she said, include older families with no children at home, young people who have postponed both their marriage and family until they are established in their careers, and married women who have escaped from the "pink collar ghetto."

Those experiencing the "worst of times," she said, are farm families, ethnic families, single-parent families and families with adult children still at home.

Older families are benefitting because the elderly are experiencing better health, increased financial security and longer lives, she said.

The elderly are fortunate, Aldous said, because their pension plans are indexed for inflation.

"One outcome of the Depression was the shortening of the engagement period so more exploration of couple compatibility is within marriage, not without. This may have set the stage for the rising divorce rate."

—Joan Aldous

Rising education costs, the need for a college degree to obtain a good job and the tightness of the job market are forcing children to live at home longer. This can cause problems in the family because young adults want the freedom that comes with age, but they lack the financial ability to move out, she said.

Parents also suffer in this situation because "the very presence of the young adult in the home suggests parents have failed in socialization of their children," Aldous said.

She said the parents might also experience a strain on their relationship due to a lack of time alone.

"There is no longer great community, family or peer pressure to stay together," Aldous said, explaining the rising incidence of divorce.

"One outcome of the Depression was the shortening of the engagement period so more exploration of couple compatibility is within marriage, not without," she said. "This may have set the stage for the rising divorce rate."

"When there are economic troubles, children are the hardest hit," Aldous said, adding that one-fifth of the children in the United States live in poverty compared to less than one-sixth of the general population.

Poverty and unemployment can lead to inadequate education, health and living conditions as well as child abuse and divorce, Aldous said.

"Too many people think children are other people's problems," she said. "Children are the very near future of our society, and even if we are single, we should care about the education, health and living conditions of children."

Another change in society is that people, especially men, are spending an increasing time outside of marriage and having fewer children, she said. This large number of people living outside of marriage and families will affect public policy, Aldous said.

"Family life has lost its taken-for-granted quality," Aldous said. "People are being more careful."

"No family is an island. We all need help and support. Families are here to stay, but in a variety of ways. The bad news is couples have to work harder to keep their families together, but the good news is couples are more willing to do this and more aware that they need to do this."

The forum is part of the Nov. 3-5 "Working with Families" seminar focusing on rural families in the Midwest.

Ruth Hoeftin, for whom the forum is named, was the dean of the College of Home Economics, which is now the College of Human Ecology, from 1975 to 1983. She is currently the director of Fenix, a program for older students.

Coffeyville refinery attains reduced rate by special contract

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission issued a formal order today approving a special contract between Kansas Gas and Electric Co., Wichita, and its fourth largest industrial customer, the Farmland Industries refinery at Coffeyville.

The KCC had tentatively approved the pact Oct. 14.

The special contract, the third approved for KG&E with its big industrial electricity customers, permits the utility to reduce its rates to Farmland Industries at the refinery in order to keep it as a customer.

Farmland had threatened to install its own cogeneration unit and leave the KG&E system if it could not negotiate a special contract reducing its cost of power.

The commission said in a statement it approved the special contract because the loss of Farmland as a customer would have increased the fixed costs borne by other KG&E customers. Under the special contract, the KCC said, the new Farmland rates "will make a substantial contribution to fixed costs."

The new contract is a five-year agreement under which Farmland will make a one-time prepayment to KG&E of $3 million, Farmland will be billed $280,000 monthly for eight million kilowatt hours of electricity and will pay 3.5 cents per kilowatt of power used beyond that level. After three years the two companies will review mutual advantages of a joint cogeneration project.

Farmland is expected to save about $3 million.

Turnout down 1,300 voters

By Candy Leonard
Government Editor

The number of students who turned out to vote in the student government election Tuesday and Wednesday was down from the previous election, according to election officials. A total of 2,563 votes were cast in this week's SGA election, as compared to 3,823 voters in February's contest.

Debbie Fields, chairman of the SGA Elections Committee, said the athletic fee referendum last February may have been the cause for the difference in student voters.

"Overall, everything went real smoothly (during this election)," Fields said, adding she was relieved not to have any computer malfunctions after last year's fiasco which prevented the tallies from completion until the following day.

Fields praised the work of her committee of eight, saying they helped publicize the change of elections from February to November.

"There was enough information that people knew it was election time," she said.

Besides publicity, the committee handled sorting ballots, scheduling poll-workers, processing of the vote totals and enforcing the election regulations. The decision was made to accept only the full names of any write-in candidates.

Monte Couchman, who lost in his attempt to win a write-in campaign for student body president, said he gained from the experience of the campaign.

"If anything else, I was hoping to go another week, but it didn't turn out that way," Couchman said.

He said his inability to participate in a presidential candidate's debate sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls and Putnam Hall was a disadvantage to his campaign.

The election committee's requirement that his entire name be written on the ballot also hurt his campaign, Couchman said.

"A write-in campaign is at a clear disadvantage," Couchman said.

"I'm real supportive of both of the candidates," he added.

Pat Muir made a brief statement to the Collegian after learning of his defeat.

"I'd like to thank all those who voted for me and all my supporters," he said.

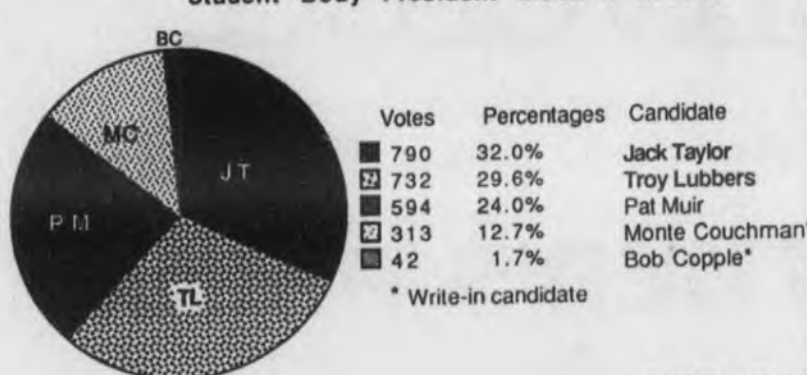

The majority of write-in winners came from the Graduate School. Because of a six-way tie, the final senator will be selected by the Graduate School Council.

The 48 newly elected senators are expected to attend tonight's Student Senate meeting at 7 in the Big Eight Room. They will not be sworn in to begin their official duties, however, until Nov. 19. The senators will elect a new Senate chairperson Dec. 3.

The Elections Committee will remain active this week in preparation for the run-off between student body presidential candidates. Students will be able to vote Wednesday in the Union.

Collegian Reporter Erwin Seba contributed to this report.

resolution proposing all Aggieville businesses close on the day of the next K-State-KU football game.

The Aggieville Merchants' Association, however, refused to comply with the Senate resolution. Since then, several precautionary measures have been taken by the Association to prevent a repeat of last year's violence, but none were those proposed or agreed upon by Senate.

The virtual inaccessibility of Anderson Hall to handicapped students is another example of how Senate has acted to solve a pressing campus problem.

The need was recognized for a handicapped elevator to be installed at the front entrance of Anderson Hall in 1986. The administration exerted no pressure on Senate in this decision but, at the same time, it had no immediate plans to correct the problem. Although Senate felt it was the responsibility of the state to correct this problem, it was a student concern and was treated as such.

Although it was also slated as a student concern, the athletic fee was shown to be a low priority item after a defeat by the student body referendum. In this case, Senate was largely divided over the issue.

Over the span of 13 months, from September 1985 to September 1986, statements were made and articles printed stating that anywhere from three to all of the other Big Eight had a fee to support non-revenue sports, said Steve Milligan, graduate student in chemical engineering. Final analysis revealed three schools with stated athletic fees and one with the fee included in the regular student fees.

Senate formed a committee to research this problem, composed of nine Senate members and an ex-officio non-voting athletic department member. With an oral presentation of its findings, the committee presented a bill supporting the fee. No written report was issued. When put to the student vote, the bill was defeated.

One week prior to that vote, a bill was passed rewording part of the Student Governing Association Constitution. It was changed to read "Laws providing for creation or change of all student fees under Student Senate jurisdiction will require a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the membership of the Student Senate. If the Student Body President does not veto the measure with in three (3) full school days it becomes law." The italicized words originally read "an increase in the student activity fee." It is this change that prevented Senate from reintroducing the bill and having it pass.

In order for a senator to reintroduce a bill, one of two situations must exist. More than one-third of the student body must vote concerning the issue. Any less than this number would not be sufficient to warrant reintroducing the bill. In the second case, two-thirds of the students who did vote on the issue must have concurred.

Conflicting stories have circulated concerning action taken by the Senate chairwoman shortly after it became obvious the athletic fee would not pass.

One version involves backing the administration's desire for the athletic fee. Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, working with several other senators, took action drafting a new bill and finding sponsors to present it to the Senate for a vote.

"At that time, they thought it was the keen idea. That's the problem you have when you don't get feedback (from students after the vote)," said

Kirk Caraway, senior in political science. "If you can get one half of the senators to sponsor the bill, you've got it made."

According to a Collegian article, Traeger was quoted as saying: "Senate can pass the fee. We're going to bring it up. I think something definitely needs to be done."

It is clear to most observers that Traeger was working in conjunction with the administration.

However, some believe Traeger simply wanted to see what kind of support there was for the new bill. The motive was to generate ideas for another way to support non-revenue sports, said Doug Folk, junior in electrical engineering.

"She felt like this was still a problem and she felt like there might be another solution. I never saw it (the bill). If she did (write it), I haven't seen it," he said.

If this ever did occur, the idea was quickly abandoned when it was realized that although 59 percent of the students who voted concerning the bill were favorable of the fee, two-thirds of the voters were required for passage. Also, not even one-third of the student body voted on the issue. With such a low voter turnout, Senate could not propose a new bill.

The portion of the student body that expressed its opposition to the athletic fee was fortunate the constitutional revisions had been made. Otherwise, Traeger would have had every right to propose the new bill and, if passed and no action had been taken by the student body president within three full school days, K-State would now be supporting an athletic fee for non-revenue sports.

Bramlage Coliseum

Quite possibly the most controversial Senate-administration collaboration prior to Holton Hall is the Fred Bramlage Coliseum. Money for the project came from three sources: Student Senate, the athletic department and the Alumni Association — with Fred Bramlage as its primary donor.

The idea for the Coliseum is said to be student-initiated. The initial opposition came in the spring of 1985 when student senators called twice for a study to determine its market feasibility. The first bill, being poorly organized, was voted down.

"The student senators didn't lobby at all. They just put in the bill calling that the studies by done," Milligan said.

The second attempt was also voted down, but for another reason. The referendum bill was written to simply suggest the Coliseum issue be explored with studies — not halted. It did not pass the required two-thirds student vote.

Due to budget overexpenditure during the summer months, the issue simply exploded that fall. Once again a bill was introduced calling for a market study. If the study was not feasible, Senate was prepared to propose withdrawing its support of the project, Milligan said.

"It was normal architectural procedural study, but the main argument tended to emphasize the market (study)," he said.

Media representatives from Topeka were present at the meeting.

Ironically, yet another bill was introduced the following week calling for the planning to continue with additional student representation on the Coliseum Program Committee. This was the result of a meeting between Fred Bramlage, some administration officials and the two senators who sponsored the bill.

The Coliseum was the first large-scale project heavily supported by the alumni. If it failed, chances were very slim of another similar project succeeding. It was imperative to the administration that Senate not withdraw its support — thus jeopardizing future projects.

Feds smash large drug transport ring

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Federal agents have smashed the nation's largest, most sophisticated drug transport ring, which used spotter planes, infrared beacons and decoy plane passengers called "cover girls" to avoid detection, authorities said Wednesday.

The Miami-based ring was contracted by the Medellin Cartel, the Colombia-based drug smuggling organization responsible for 80 percent of U.S. cocaine imports, to haul cocaine from Colombia to the United States, investigators said.

"This was the largest transportation network used by the Medellin Cartel between 1982 and 1986," said Bill Perry, acting special agent in charge of the Miami FBI office. "Essentially this takes the whole organization right out of business."

During that period, the ring hauled 20,000 pounds of cocaine in 19 shipments, in addition to four relatively small marijuana shipments, officials said.

Loads of cocaine flown out of Colombia were dropped in Bahamian waters for later pickup by boats, which then would smuggle the drugs to the Florida coast, according to the federal indictment.

The smugglers were so sophisticated they forced anti-drug investigators to permanently change their tactics, said Patrick O'Brien, head of the U.S. Customs Service here.

According to investigators, while the ring contracted with the Medellin Cartel to become its major U.S.

Electronic equipment 'fatal flaw' transportation link, it did not involve itself in buying or selling drugs.

The ring contracted to build $20,000 radio-infrared beacons — which gave rise to the case name "Operation Beacon" — to be attached to cocaine loads dumped at sea. The loads would float just below the surface to avoid detection by others, but could be located easily by spotters with radio receivers or infrared goggles, said O'Brien.

The smugglers also bought an oceanside Miami condominium and stationed an observer with binoculars there to keep track of Customs and Coast Guard vessels, said O'Brien. They also had a well-equipped radio room in Miami to communicate with their planes and boats and Colombian and Bahamian contacts.

The ring's spotter planes followed their own aircraft and drug boats, warning of approaching vessels and watching over shipments dumped in the ocean.

"They owned aircraft, they owned vessels, they had elaborate covers of flying women aboard their aircraft to make it look like they were charter flights or on vacation," he said. The women were referred to by the ring as "cover girls," he said.

Agents confiscated 12 aircraft, 21 motor vehicles, 28 boats and 17 pieces of property used by the ring, with a total value of $5 million.

While the ring's electronic sophistication was one of its assets, it also turned out to be its fatal flaw, said O'Brien.

O'Brien said a man the ring contacted to build the beacons had also worked with Customs and gave authorities information on the ring's activities.

Another source in the case was informant Max Mermelstein, the former U.S. connection for the cartel, who has worked with investigators for several years.

The indictment named 30 people, including the alleged leaders, Michael Munday and James Coley. Munday is one of two indicted who are fugitives, and Coley is among seven people already in custody on other charges.

Thirteen others, including Palm Beach Grand Prix promoter Lloyd Frink, were arrested Wednesday when 115 agents fanned out across South Florida, and the remaining eight people indicted were being sought.

Munday and Coley dealt with Medellin Cartel leaders Jorge, Fabio and Juan David Ochoa Vasquez, along with Rafael Cardona Salazar and Pablo Escobar Gavira.

Play examines social, political issues

By Stacey Schumacher
Collegian Reporter

The Bilingual Foundation for the Arts will present the play "Orinoco," performed by Theater/Teatro, at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium. The play will be performed in English from a translation by Margaret Peden.

"Orinoco" is the story of two somewhat faded showgirls who journey down the exotic South American river, the Orinoco, to perform for the crew of an oil camp. Their trip is interrupted when the entire crew of the steamer mysteriously disappears.

Preview

Carmen Zapata and Ivonne Coll portray Mina and Fifi, two women with opposing personalities who find themselves adrift on a dangerous river. The play centers around the efforts of these two women to determine in which direction to steer the boat, and to understand the situation in which they now find themselves. In their efforts to understand the situation, Mina and Fifi also examine and analyze their own lives as they give rather contradictory explanations for their predicament.

Written by Mexican playwright Emilio Carballido, the play draws a parallel between the plight of the two women and the social and political situation of Latin America today.

"It speaks directly to some of the issues concerning Latin America's political and social realities," said

Bradley Shaw, professor of modern languages.

Shaw and Antonia Pigno, adviser of the Mexican American Council of students, are responsible for bringing the play to K-State on behalf of the council. They drew up a proposal and received a grant from the Mid-America Arts Alliance, which is handling the promotion of the company's tour in the Midwest.

"I thought it would be a chance for people to see something truly Latin American and contemporary," Shaw said.

Zapata is both president and managing producer of the BFA, which the actress cofounded 13 years ago with director Margarita Galban and designer Estela Scarlata. She began her career on Broadway in the original production of "Oklahoma" as a singing comedienne. She has appeared in hundreds of major television series and films. Lottery official asks for faster payments

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Kansas Lottery official asked a legislative committee Wednesday to change a law that he said will delay the payment of large prizes to winners.

Mike Grogan, deputy lottery director, urged the Special Committee on Federal and State Affairs to ask the full Legislature to allow the lottery's regional offices to pay prizes larger than $50.

Tickets for the lottery's first game, which features $1 ticket with latex patches that buyers scratch off to see whether they have won anything, will go on sale Nov. 12. The largest "instant" prize a person can receive is $5,000, and people may also win $500.

Grogan said lottery officials want to avoid the experience of other states.

Jessica's little toe removed

By The Associated Press

MIDLAND, Texas — Surgeons on Wednesday removed the little toe on the right foot of Jessica McClure during the toddler's fifth operation since she was rescued last month from an abandoned well.

The 19-month-old girl underwent about four hours of surgery at Midland Memorial Hospital and was listed in stable condition, said hospital spokeswoman Sue Ristom.

Doctors have not decided whether they will have to remove the big toe on the same foot, which was wedged in an awkward position while she was stuck in the well for 58½ hours, Ms. Ristom said.

Orthopedic surgeons also removed dead skin from Jessica's foot, but no skin grafts were performed during the procedure. In addition, doctors performed plastic surgery Wednesday to help heal a severe scrape on the girl's forehead.

Attention KSU Faculty & Staff

The time has come to choose your health care coverage for 1988. There are two choices available: Blue Select or you can choose HMO Kansas coverage. Let me tell you

THE TRUTH ABOUT HMOs

HMOs were not designed to maintain your health but to save money for insurance companies. This explains why there have been so many of them started lately. When you pick your primary physician, you have just given almost total control of your health care to that doctor. Whether you have headaches, back pain, menstrual cramps, ingrown toenails, eye problems, a broken leg, or diarrhea, you must go to your primary physician first.

According to the theory, if your primary physician doesn't feel he can treat your problem, he will refer you to another physician who specializes in that area. The sad truth is, it doesn't happen as often as it should. The primary physician receives a set amount of money each month from the HMO whether you visit them or not. When you do seek care, if the primary physician does not feel he can treat you, he is supposed to send you to another

Your decision on health care coverage boils down to freedom of choice. This is one of the fundamentals on which this country is based. Don't give up that basic right. The Blue Select program is not nearly as good as the old Blue Cross/Blue Shield coverage, but by selecting Blue Select you still have the chance to be in control of your life.

Student loan defaults high in '85

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Nineteen colleges and trade schools in Kansas had student loan default rates of 50 percent or more in 1985, according to a report released Wednesday.

The Education Department identified the schools as among more than 500 institutions nationwide where 50 percent or more of the graduates or dropouts have refused to pay back their loans.

Secretary of Education William J. Bennett released the list, threatening to cut off schools from federal student aid programs in the future if their default rates exceed 20 percent. A total of 75 institutions in Kansas had default rates that high for fiscal 1985. The national average default rate was 13 percent.

Here is a list of selected Kansas institutions, their loan default rate and number of borrowers obligated to repay their loans:

Gibson: filled with 'Purple Pride'

Ex-coach sparked excitement

Editor's Note: To celebrate "Purple Pride Day" Saturday at KSU Stadium during the K-State-University of Kansas football game, former coach Vince Gibson will be in attendance. A reception for Gibson and former Wildcat quarterback Lynn Dickey will be held following the game at 5 p.m. at the University Inn.

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

For a span of eight magical seasons, beginning with Vince Gibson's arrival in 1967, K-State had a football program that was comparable to Camelot.

Under Gibson — the coach who coined the phrase "Purple Pride" — K-State won 33 games, a feat that still ranks as the second-best victory tally ever held by a Wildcat football coach. In that time span, K-State defeated Oklahoma two consecutive years, shut out Nebraska once, and tied for second in the Big Eight Conference in 1970.

Also during Gibson's purple reign, the 'Cats moved into the 42,000-seat KSU Stadium (where synthetic turf was later installed), a dormitory was built to board K-State athletes, and the stadium facility that houses the football coaches' offices and dressing rooms was finished in 1972.

It was the best of times and, yet, it was the worst of times.

While Gibson was at K-State, the school was slapped with a three-year probation by the National Collegiate Athletic Association for numerous violations. Gibson's teams defeated Kansas only twice in eight tries and had only one winning season in 1970, finishing 6-5.

Gibson announced his decision to resign from his position at K-State in November of 1974. That announcement came just three days after the 'Cats had whipped Colorado, 33-19, in an impressive season-ending performance.

"I just got burnt out. It wasn't one of those deals where I had to leave," Gibson said.

"I had been there eight years and — knowing that you have to compete against Oklahoma and Nebraska — I just got to where I thought, 'let somebody else fight this awhile.'"

What Gibson is most remembered for is instilling a sense of pride surrounding Wildcat football. It's something that preceding or subsequent coaches have been unable to achieve.

"I am firmly convinced that no one else could have done the job that this man has done at K-State," said former athletic director Ernie Barrett, when Gibson announced his resignation.

And former University President James A. McCain said, "No one could have worked harder or with greater dedication than Vince Gibson during his years as K-State's football coach. Those who take the long view will recognize his achievements as prodigious."

Prior to Gibson's arrival, the 'Cats hadn't won a game in 2½ years and were suffering through a 21-game losing streak. Morale was so bad that only 1,000 season tickets were sold in 1966.

At first, promoting K-State football wasn't easy. Gibson and his coaching staff even resorted to selling tickets to Manhattan and Aggieville merchants.

"We did what we had to do," Gibson said. "We didn't have any money, and we all had to work together."

But "Purple Pride" quickly caught on. After the 'Cats defeated Colorado State in Fort Collins in the 1967 season opener — K-State's only win that season — approximately 8,000 fans were waiting at Manhattan Airport to greet the Wildcats upon their return. And in 1974, a record 43,756 fans packed KSU Stadium to watch K-State battle Kansas.

Gibson, though, isn't about to take all the glory for the "Purple Pride" craze.

"When I went out there, nobody wore purple, and we just started talking about how we had to start wearing purple and having pride in our program," he said. "All of a sudden, people started talking about 'Purple Pride.'"

He also gave credit to the students. "I was a big fan of the K-State students. We used to have meetings on Monday, show (the students) the films, but it was a bad situation. ... But the students came to me and said,

"Coach, let us help you recruit."

Soon, the Alley Cats (a recruiting organization) and the Gibson Girls (coeds who helped promote football) were established.

"(The students) got together, and they're the ones who built the spirit diminish the rivalry between the Wildcats and the Jayhawks.

"KU was always the big game," Gibson said. "We were real big enemies with them, which wasn't a healthy thing. Our (rivalry) was too bitter."

Gibson counsels his players during a game in KSU Stadium. He coached the Wildcats from 1967-74 before resigning.

up. It was really amazing," Gibson said.

Even though K-State proved it could compete with Oklahoma and Nebraska, Gibson said it didn't

What added fuel to the fire was the fact that the NCAA slapped its penalty in Gibson's face the Thursday before K-State played the Jayhawks in 1970.

To this day, he personally blames Kansas.

"What the NCAA got on us was a lot of little things that everybody else was doing," Gibson said.

"One of our kids went to KU and said one of our coaches had given him a test. Another violation involved us taking (KU quarterback) David Jaynes to supper in Kansas City when we recruited him.

"That's what made (the rivalry) so bitter. It's not like we were really cheating, trying to break the rules. We were fighting to build the program; fighting to survive. Here we were fixing to go to a bowl game, and (Kansas) knocked us off our feet," he added. "We survived (the probation), but we could never get the program going again."

Gibson now operates Spectacular Sports Specials, a business in Louisiana that arranges travel for companies to major sporting events. He said he doesn't miss coaching.

"I enjoyed coaching, and I had a good time...but I don't miss it," he said. "Every Sunday morning your stomach doesn't have to hurt. There isn't a more miserable feeling than losing on Saturday night."

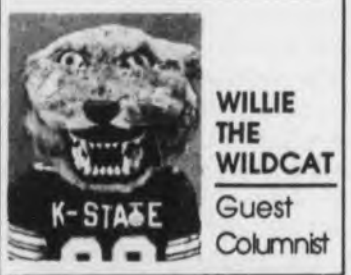

And he isn't about to second-guess what would have happened if he had remained at K-State.

"You have no way of knowing. K-State's a very hard job because of the competition," Gibson said. "All the teams in the Big Eight have had their taste of glory, but none of them has

Commentary

Dear K-State Sports Fans, It's that time of year again when "K-You-know-who" comes to town! The season has been tough so far, but we've had some great moments against some great teams — now it's our turn to win. I hope you will turn out this Saturday to cheer on the 'Cats when they play the 'Hawks.

You CAN make a difference. I've been to several away games with the Cheerleaders and I can tell you, it makes a difference to have a crowd behind you. Let's fill the stadium and cheer the Wildcats on to a victory.

As for after the game, here's something to think about. A K-State victory will show the state of Kansas who has a better team, but our actions after the game will show who has the better fans! A lot of you know we recently received a good sportsmanship award, presented at Midnight Madness, for last year's basketball season. Let's show our team and the public that we are good sports when it comes to football, too.

When the game is over and K-State has a victory, celebrate as much as you want, but please do it in the stands without hurting any property on or off the field. After all, we know we're great fans at a great university; post game will be our chance to show this to everyone else — including a lot of parents.

So when you come to the stadium this Saturday, wear your purple and cheer on the 'Cats, Lynn Dickey, Steve Grogan and Mr. "Purple Pride" himself, Vince Gibson. The football team will be doing its job during the game to make K-State proud, so it's up to us to make K-State proud when we celebrate a victory!

See you at the game! Everyone a Wildcat, Willie the Wildcat

P.S. — The K-State Marching Band will also be "playing against" the visiting KU band. Just like for the teams, I hope you will show respect for both bands. They have put in a lot of work for this week's performance, too.

Four members of K-State's cross country squads made the 1987 academic All-Big Eight Conference teams. The University of Nebraska and K-State each landed two players on the men's roster and the Wildcats and Iowa State University had two members apiece on the women's side.

Daryl Reichard and Joe Bonneau earned recognition on the men's team, and Anne Stadler and Laura Haggerty were picked from the women's squad. Alysun Deckert was tabbed with an honorable mention.

Student-athletes must have a 2.8 grade point average and carry at least 12 hours to qualify.

Reichard, senior in electrical engineering, has a 3.62 GPA; Bonneau, sophomore in biology, has a 3.68 GPA; Stadler, senior in education, has a 4.0 GPA; Haggerty, junior in

Wallace's season now officially over

By Bill Lang
Sports Writer

It's over. For David Wallace, senior line-backer for the K-State football team, the season has positively come to an end.

"We (the doctors and I) tried everything possible to see if I could make a comeback for the K-State-Kansas game," he said of his rehabilitation efforts on his left knee.

On Oct. 3, Wallace sustained severe ligament damage to his left knee in the first quarter of the Tulsa game.

During the last 2½ weeks, Wallace has attempted to practice. After every practice, though, Wallace said the "pain was still there."

"I tried to work it as hard as possible and see what I could do," he said. "The knee still felt weak and loose. It also felt like that there were parts still floating around."

Wallace said the ending of his football career was easier to accept now than when he first got word after the Tulsa game.

"We kept testing the knee and talking things over with the coaches, coach (Stan) Parrish and the doctors he said," Wallace said. "I went into Coach Parrish's office the other day and he said, 'We're going to have to retire you.'"

"It wasn't easy to hear that," he added. "But it was for the better."

In case the coaches think they have finally gotten Wallace out of the football offices, they might think again.

"I'll still be going to the line-backer meetings," he said. "I'll still be on the sidelines talking to the other guys and telling them Being ranked last in the Big Eight Conference preseason poll doesn't give Colorado Coach Tom Miller much to be enthusiastic about. But don't tell him that.

"I've been accused of being the most optimistic guy ever met by none other than (Indiana Coach) Bob Knight," Miller said. "And that's the way I approach things. I think we can do the job and be in great situations (in the future). It's going to take a little time...recruiting is going to be the bottom line. You have to get good players."

"We have a whole new group of kids and I think we have a little different attitude about what we're doing," Miller said. "I'm pleased with the attitude and the competition. Whether that translates into wins or losses I don't know right now. But I think we're going to compete. I think we're going to be a team that's well prepared, well conditioned and ready to play."

With a schedule that includes some of the toughest opponents in the nation, including Purdue, Wyoming, Bradley and the Big Eight teams, things aren't going to be easy for Miller.

"I think we have another killer type of schedule this year," Miller said. "Something I know our kids are aware of. I think it forces them to raise their level of play in everything they do."

"We're going to have to play pretty close to our best again this year (to compete)," Miller said. "We can't be a team that gets out and runs and guns with anybody. I think what we try and do is really smart aggressive defense, man-to-man defense...and run a motion offense."

"We had about five games with one- or two-point losses on the road," Miller said. "We played our best basketball at the end of the season. We gave Missouri a heck of a game in the Big Eight Tournament. It was tied at 59 with a 1:14 left in the game."

Colorado is improving steadily, but isn't at a level to compete and win consistently against teams like Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri. But they aren't about to admit it to themselves or anyone else.

"I can't say we're going to beat (nationally ranked teams), but I think we have a chance to win every time we play," senior center Scott Wilke said. "We can play with them. We just have to play well to do it."

"The things we've been stressing in preseason is picking up our defensive pressure," Wilke said. "So far our defense has looked good. We're working hard...and this year I think we'll play a little faster pace. We still won't want to go at Oklahoma's or Missouri's pace. We want to play at our pace."

"I feel we're in the middle of the pack," Wilke said. "I don't think we're a last place team. We're going to play better this year."

"The attitude is different (this season)," Wilke said. "Everyone seems to be working a little harder and the

With football partially out of the way, Wallace can finally focus on schoolwork and look forward to graduation next May.

"I missed a lot of school due to the injury and the surgery that followed the injury," he said. "I've got a lot of class work to catch up on and start looking for jobs to do."

As for this weekend, will Wallace be squirming and fighting on the sidelines knowing he won't get to play in the K-State-KU game?

"I'm not from Kansas, so I don't think of it as that big a game," the Bettendorf, Iowa native said. "I hated missing the Oklahoma and the Nebraska games more than this one."

As for the prediction for this weekend's game, Wallace said the Jayhawks are in for a long afternoon.

"We (the team) are pumped up," he said. "Practices have been real good and everybody is healthy and ready to beat 'em."

Not setting their goals for the sky is a good idea for the Colorado team. But after finishing the Big Eight last season with their first three conference victories in more than a year, they may be on their way to achieving a .500 season in the near future.

Four starters and five lettermen, along with a redshirt-transfer, return from last year's 9-19 squad that placed last in the Big Eight at 3-11. Miller feels the team is still rebuilding, but now has a solid front line.

"To me, we're still in a state of flux in our development as a basketball team," Miller said. "With Scott Wilke and Dan Becker as the returning starters, and Brian Robinson and Brent Vaughan also back, we have a good nucleus. With a couple of the freshmen, Rodell Guest and Bill Markham, to hopefully challenge for some playing time, it makes for a good front line situation."

Miller shrugs off the importance of the media's preseason poll that has placed him at the bottom of the heap and, if asked, gives a good reason why polls aren't extremely important.

"The only poll that ever interests me is the one that comes at the end of the season after all the games have been played," Miller said. "If the Minnesota Twins had paid any attention to what the preseason prognosticators were saying, all they would have done was collect their paycheck. They wouldn't have won the World Series."

Miller 1, media 0. But don't look for Colorado to place any higher than 6th in the Big Eight.

Colorado is improving, but they still have a long way to go before they can beat the first division conference teams.

Gibson

been consistent except for Oklahoma and Nebraska. The others just have the misfortune of playing against them year after year."

Though he had the luxury of coaching two of K-State's most prolific passers in Steve Grogan and Lynn Dickey, and the Wildcats' top rusher in Issac Jones, Gibson said there are other keys to being successful at K-State.

"Every program has its ups and downs. What you have to do is play four teams that are beatable outside the Big Eight because (the conference is) so tough," he said.

"And you have to get some leadership in the student body and get the enthusiasm built back up," Gibson added. "You play harder when it means something to win. You can't compete with an air of apathy where the people say, 'The heck with it.'"

Gibson, forever a promoter, closed with the phrase that made him famous.

"I think the people just can't get discouraged. They have to get behind Coach Stan Parrish and rally; get that 'Purple Pride' going," Gibson said.

Kansas man re-sentenced for 5 deaths

By The Associated Press

HOLTON — A rural Mayetta man has been re-sentenced for his role in a traffic accident that claimed the lives of five people, following a state appeals court decision that he had been improperly sentenced.

Daryl S. Goodnow was re-sentenced by District Judge Tracy Klingensmith to consecutive prison terms totaling 5 to 25 years, according to Jackson County District Court records.

Klingensmith handed down the term Oct. 15 after the state appeals court sent the case back to him last July, officials said.

The appeals court upheld Goodnow's July 1986 conviction of involuntary manslaughter, but said he should have been sentenced under the state's aggravated vehicular homicide law, a lesser felony.

In September 1986, Goodnow was sentenced to five consecutive prison terms totaling 10 to 50 years. That sentence was replaced by the newer, lesser one.

Anniversary celebrated Allies praise Gorbachev's speech

By The Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — Moscow's allies Wednesday generally praised Kremlin leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev's speech marking the 70th anniversary of the October revolution but as a rule ducked comment on some of the touchier issues.

Only in Poland and Bulgaria did the official news media acknowledge the existence of opposition to Gorbachev's drive to modernize the Soviet Union.

Conservative Romania all but ignored Gorbachev's economic reforms.

The East bloc as a whole softened his criticism of Josef Stalin. In his speech, Gorbachev criticized Stalin for his purges and praised the memory of Nikita S.

Khrushchev, who experimented with more liberal economic policies. The Soviet leader also reiterated his call for more openness in Soviet society as part of his program to restructure the ailing economy.

On Wednesday, the Warsaw daily Zycie Warszawy ran a commentary that said: "Irrespective of the still existing resistance on various levels of Soviet authority, Mikhail Gorbachev has clearly and for a long time stressed the necessity of change." The Polish newspaper did not elaborate.

The Polish Communist Party newspaper Trybuna Ludu, in a commentary carried on Tuesday, called Gorbachev's speech "an honest, open and true picture of the past."

Poland is experimenting with an ambitious package of economic reforms similar to those occurring in the Soviet Union.

The Bulgarian Communist Party daily Rabotnichesko Delo mentioned the "resistance of the conservative forces against reconstruction" but failed to identify the alleged opposition.

However, it credited the Soviet Communist Party with pushing through Gorbachev's plans to inject more flexibility into the rigid Soviet enonomic and political structures.

Bulgaria, like Poland, is experimenting with economic liberalization.

The Czechoslovak party daily Rude Pravo praised the Soviet leader's "frank and analytic look at the past, present and future."

Rude Pravo said Gorbachev's "perestroika," or reconstruction, is based "on the 70-year history of the pioneer road of building a principally new social system."

Radio Prague and Rude Pravo also reported a Tass dispatch that Moscow Communist party chief Boris Yeltsin had tendered his resignation after criticizing party policy-making.

The disclosure was the first public confirmation in Eastern Europe of Kremlin discord since Gorbachev became party chief.

The Hungarian Communist Party organ Nepszabadsag credited Gorbachev's speech with "reflecting a new way of thinking" in recent Soviet foreign policy decisions.

In non-aligned Yugoslavia, Gorbachev's speech was carried by TV news, which focused on his criticism of Stalin. The speech was only summarized in the state-run press.

Iraqi warplanes bomb oil terminal

By The Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iraq said its warplanes bombed Iran's main oil export terminal Wednesday, raided oil facilities on the mainland and attacked four tankers in its enemy's coastal waters. Iraq admitted losing one plane.

In Washington, the State Department said it regretted that a crew member on a United Arab Emirates vessel was killed when the U.S. Navy frigate Carr fired on three Arab fishing boats Sunday in the Persian Gulf. It did not say the United States was at fault.

Iran marked the eighth anniversary of the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, the Iranian capital, with huge street demonstrations and renewed demands for a withdrawal of American warships from the region.

The 15th convoy of U.S. warships and Kuwaiti tankers flying the American flag sailed up the gulf, where Iran and Iraq have been at war since September 1980, with no reports of trouble.

The convoy passed the midpoint in the 550-mile journey from the Strait of Hormuz to Kuwait with the missile cruiser William H. Standley and frigate Ford guarding the tankers Surf City and Chesapeake City. Two Kuwaiti tugs towed mine-sweeping gear.

Pentagon spokesmen in Washington said three American mine sweepers had entered the gulf, bringing the number to five with a sixth on the way.

A military communique from Iraq said its warplanes bombed production and processing installations of the Baznan oilfield near Bushehr, an Iranian port in the northern gulf. It said others raided a "large naval target," the standard reference to a tanker, off the coast.

It said a television relay station in western Iran was bombed "to silence the voice and cheap lies" of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's fundamentalist regime.

In a later report, Iraq said its planes bombed the western jetty at the huge Kharg Island export oil terminal, "scoring destructive hits," and attacked a "large naval target berthing off the western jetty." It said the third and fourth tankers were hit off the coast in late afternoon and Wednesday night.

Iran claimed the Iraq raids were on civilian areas. It said two planes were shot down, one of them while "violating air space" over Kharg.

Communiqués issued in Baghdad confirmed the loss of one aircraft and denied raiding civilian areas.

In Dubai, shipping and diplomatic sources said Moslem holidays would delay until Saturday an autopsy to determine whether a 22-year-old Indian member of the fishing boat crew was killed by gunfire from the Navy frigate.

A Pentagon statement Monday said the USS Carr fired machine guns at one of three vessels, suspected of being Iranian, that appeared to make a high-speed "hostile run" at the U.S. tanker Patriot. The frigate was escorting the tanker.

On Wednesday, the Pentagon said: "The details of the shooting incident are still ambiguous."

Baby M's natural mother pregnant again

By The Associated Press

NEWARK, N.J. — Surrogate mother Mary Beth Whitehead, whose fight for custody of Baby M led to a landmark court case, confirmed Wednesday she is pregnant out of wedlock.

She said she will marry the child's father as soon as she is divorced from her husband.

In a statement released by her attorney, Harold J. Cassidy, Whitehead said she began a relationship with a man named Dean Gould a few months ago and learned in late September she was pregnant by him.

Her separation from her husband, Richard, was announced in August. At the time, Whitehead cited the pressures of the case as being behind the problems of her marriage.

She has been living in an East Brunswick condominium owned by Gould. Her mother-in-law, June Whitehead, said Gould is a New York City accountant.

"Dean has been supportive of me not only in my personal life and the decisions that we have faced but in connection with my efforts to preserve a relationship with my daughter Sara," said Whitehead, using the name she gave to the child she bore under a $10,000 surrogate contract.

She lost custody of the child, known in court papers as "Baby M," in March to the biological father and his wife.

Whitehead, who has two children by her husband, said in her statement that her fourth child is due in late May or early June, and that there never was any question "I wanted and would have my baby."

"While I will always have deep feelings for Rick, our marriage is over," she said.

Speaking about women and the Constitution, Marquardt quoted

Topeka Capital-Journal columnist Dick Snider: "Ever since (the ratification of the Constitution), women have been out of control."

Knopp said he has no problem with the Equal Rights Amendment. He pointed out the ERA is not an issue in the Kansas House and "won't be for the next five years...because it has not been put on the agenda."

Marquardt related a remark from GOP presidential candidate Pat Robertson, who said: "We need more people in the work force. The way to do that is to keep our women pregnant to make more workers."

Marquardt said the dream of American women is to find a wonderful man to sweep her off her feet. In reality, half of the marriages will end up in divorce, usually with children needing care, she said.

Marquardt advised divorced housewives to obtain skilled training or else be confined to a low-paying job for the rest of their lives.

Police set for post game Arresting without warning planned

By Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

In the best of all possible worlds, Saturday the K-State Wildcats will beat the University of Kansas Jayhawks, the goalposts will be left standing in KSU Stadium and a non-violent celebration will take place in Aggieville.

But history suggests another possibility exists, so officials have developed a plan designed to minimize conditions that have contributed to past disturbances.

The plan includes arresting — without warning — those carrying open containers in Aggieville and denying Moro Street access to those carrying metal cans or glass bottles.

"We've instructed our officers to be reasonable and fair but firm in the enforcement of the law," said Alvan Johnson, director of the Riley County Police Department.

Police are also prepared, if there is a repeat of last year's disturbance, to declare all those in Aggieville to be engaging in an unlawful assembly. After that declaration, the crowd, possibly numbering between 4,000 to 6,000, will be given a few minutes to leave the area, Johnson said. Anyone left in Aggieville will be arrested after the time limit passes.

Johnson, who would make such a declaration if it became necessary, said, "It's just good business in law enforcement to cover all the possibilities, especially in view of what's happened in the past."

Nevertheless, Johnson is optimistic about what will happen Saturday night.

"I really don't believe, with all the plans we've made, that it will get out of hand," he said.

Johnson's optimism is shared by Mayor Gene Klingler, who said he would support the efforts of the RCPD and city officials to prevent violence or to restore order if violence erupts.

"God gave us the brains to use or not to use and some people just have to learn the hard way," Klingler said. "I just don't believe in this 'kids will be kids' business."

Klingler said he would not be in Aggieville Saturday, but would be available for consultations with City Manager Mike Conduff, who has full emergency authority to act for the Mauling of calves prompts warnings

By Jim Vader
Collegian Reporter

Two dogs have mauled Holstein research calves in three separate incidents recently, and at least one campus official fears the dogs may begin attacking people.

The attacks, which have taken place in a cattle pen north of Call Hall, have resulted in the death of one calf. The latest attack was Wednesday night.

In the second attack, Jim Morrill, professor of animal sciences and industry, interrupted the dogs as they were attacking the calves.

Rising DUI numbers concern police

By Jackie Brazzle
Collegian Reporter

The number of arrests for driving under the influence on campus increased 25 percent in 1986, according to figures released by the KSU Police Department. In addition, traffic violations overall were up 4 percent, prompting police to step up enforcement efforts, said Chief Charles Beckom.

Beckom said five DUIs and 263 traffic violations were written on campus last year. However, one-third of those violators were not students or employees of the University.

Beckom attributed the increase to several factors, including the steady increase of alcohol abuse on campus and within the surrounding areas.

"Society has taken an indifferent view toward alcohol," Beckom said.

Another factor is the change in the drinking age, which Beckom believes "has left a large part of our society out in the cold." This can be emphasized further by the lack of things for underage people to do in the community, he said.

Beckom said alcohol abuse is a problem for people before they come to K-State.

"The mass majority just do not acquire the problem when they get here," Beckom said. "There has been some abuse history prior to coming here."

Speaking about the increased number of traffic violations, Beckom said it is due to lack of attentiveness on the part of drivers, pedestrians and bicyclists.

"There is a safe feeling about being on a campus," he said.

Beckom said a large part of the problem is pedestrians who do not watch where they are going. This can be worsened by the fact that all groups think they have the right of way, he said.

Beckom said bicyclists have the same attitudes as pedestrians and create the same kind of problems. Bicyclists, in general, are also inattentive.

"They tend to turn without giving signals and think that stop signs and lights are only for cars," Beckom said. He also said drivers may tend to not think about bicyclists.

"People tend to think the other person is aware of them. We should be more cautious," Beckom said.

To help decrease the number of violations, the department has stepped up its enforcement. Beckom said the goal is to reduce property damage and accidents by targeting the enforcement to specific problem areas and by looking at the problems from the driver's point of view.

Beckom said increased enforcement cannot prevent everything, but it is helping officers more easily recognize drivers who are under the influence of alcohol and other traffic violators.

"This creates an increase in efficiency, which causes an increase in tickets," Beckom said.

Several tests can be given to a driver suspected of intoxication. Tests for agility/balance, coordination/ability to walk and the ability of the eyes to follow movement are often utilized.

"There is a direct correlation between the eyes' ability to function and the amount of alcohol in the system," he said, adding that the eye test is very accurate and is used nationwide.

Violators are given the choice of taking a breathalyzer test after being taken to the Riley County Jail. If the person refuses, however, his license can be revoked.

The penalties and fines resulting from a DUI or traffic violation can be extensive. For first-time offenses of DUI, a choice is offered between a jail sentence and a fine, or diversion. Diversion consists of a drivers' training course, certain license restrictions and public service work.

First-time offenders who are taken to court can face a $500 fine and/or serve one year in jail. The second or third offense of DUI can result in license suspension, a larger fine and a jail sentence.

Traffic violators are also given a choice depending on the seriousness of the violation. Traffic violations are broken down into two major categories: infractions and misdemeanors.

With an infraction, the person can choose to pay the ticket, plus court costs, to avoid going to court.

History professor discusses concept of personal liberty

By Jim Dietz
Collegian Reporter

Michael Kammen spoke at the All-University Convocation Wednesday in McCain Auditorium about changes which have occurred in the concept of personal liberty through the history of the U.S. Constitution.

Kammen, a professor of history at Cornell University, has received a Pulitzer Prize in history.

He said personal liberty is "the oldest, possibly the commonest, but surely the least understood major concept involved in the Constitution.

"The meaning of liberty has changed. Americans have always defined liberty and understood liberty in relationship to some other quality."

A problem with tracing the meaning of personal liberty is that it has meant different things at different times to different people, Kammen said.

He said in the past, personal liberty has been defined as the freedom to move about the land.

"That's a right we take for granted today, but it's not a right that could be taken for granted in the 17th and 18th century," he said.

This concept had even further stretches into the 19th and 20th century regarding racial segregation and migrant labor. Despite the fact that the words "personal liberty" never appear in the 14th Amendment, the two are definitely related, he said.

"The phrase has not only been used, but it has been misleadingly implied that the phrase actually appeared in the 14th Amendment," Kammen said.

Personal liberty has even extended into what may and may not be put on Kammen analyzes Bork hearings

Education, changes in the concept of personal liberty, and even the nomination proceedings of Robert Bork have combined to enhance the bicentennial celebration of the U.S. Constitution.

Michael Kammen, a Pulitzer Prize historian, discussed the impact of the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution at a press conference Thursday in the Union Conference Room.

"I think one can say that of the four previous celebrations, this one has seen more thoughtful, engaged, informed discussion of the nature of our constitutional system," Kammen said.

"The confirmation hearings concerning Bork couldn't have come at a better time," he said.

Kammen said the September hearings provided a lesson for Americans. The thoughtful questions and answers concerning a range of constitutional issues were provided by the Senate Judiciary Committee and

Bald eagles bypass park

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK, Mont. — The annual spectacle of hundreds of bald eagles converging on Glacier National Park to feast on spawning salmon is proving to be a dud this year, park officials say, with the number of eagles down 80 percent and salmon almost non-existent.

Park biologists counted 47 eagles this week, compared with 236 the same week last year. State game officials, who track salmon runs, counted 120 salmon making their way up McDonald Creek to spawning grounds, compared with 7,400 last year.

Riley McClelland, wildlife biologist for Glacier Park, cited the unusually warm fall.

The eagle migration "will probably peak within the next two weeks," he said. "But with the low number of salmon, most of the birds will just continue on."

Park officials say they don't know why the salmon run has dropped off so precipitously.

Tournament sets off battle

BOMBAY, India — Moslems and Hindus fought Thursday, injuring 21 people, in a battle set off by India's loss in a cricket tournament, an official said.

Police fired in the air to disperse the fighters, who threw gasoline-soaked rags, said the official of the city's Fire Control Room, speaking on condition of anonymity. It was not known if anyone was injured by gunfire.

The battles began when Hindus got angry at Moslem fans of the Pakistani team, who were celebrating India's loss to England in the World Cup tournament.

Rioting was also reported in Ahmedabad in Gujarat state, but there were no injuries.

After Pakistan lost its World Cup cricket bid Wednesday, Hindu celebrations set off clashes in New Delhi.

Appeals court orders new trial

TOPEKA — The Kansas Court of Appeals ordered a new trial Wednesday on behalf of a Wichita prizefighter who filed suit against Safeway Stores after he purchased a loaf of bread that allegedly had a needle imbedded in it.

The appeals court ruled that Sedgwick District Judge Hal Malone committed errors in the instructions he gave to the jury when Robert Hazelton sued Safeway. The jury ruled in favor of Safeway.

According to court records, Hazelton's father-in-law bought a loaf of bread at a Wichita Safeway Store on Sept. 27, 1983.

Hazelton apparently ate a sandwich and felt something scratching his throat and spit out a common pin. He told his wife to call the police, the appeals court opinion said, but later in the day he had stomach cramps and vomited blood. The following day x-rays were taken that showed Hazelton, a heavy-weight boxer, had a pin in his intestines. It was surgically removed.

The appeals court ruled that the judge committed a reversible error by instructing the jury that Hazelton had the burden to prove a needle was in a loaf of bread when it was "manufactured" instead of "time of sale."

Safeway baked, sliced, wrapped, and tested the bread in another city before delivering it to the store in Wichita, the opinion said.

Custody given to father's lover

SAN DIEGO — A judge Thursday awarded custody of a 16-year-old boy to his late father's homosexual lover, saying the youth would then have the "stable and wholesome environment" his fundamentalist Christian mother couldn't provide.

Betty Lou Batey and her lawyer walked out of the hearing before guardianship of her son Brian was awarded, refusing to participate and charging that Superior Court Judge Judith McConnell was biased.

"I'm not fighting anymore. We're leaving it to whatever Brian wants. I'm just hoping his life won't be destroyed," Batey said.

Under the ruling, Brian will continue to live in Palm Springs with Craig Corbett, who sought custody after Brian's father, Frank, died of an AIDS-related illness in June.

Frank and Betty Lou Batey had fought a bitter and protracted battle over Brian, with Betty Lou Batey at one point snatching the boy, then age 11, and going into hiding for more than 1½ years. "I'm glad it's over," Corbett said Thursday, wiping away tears.

Asked how he and Brian could put the dispute behind them, he replied: "You don't. It's been a part of our life for five years. And it won't stop."

Robot nurses to get trial run

DANBURY, Conn. — Patients at Danbury Hospital looking for an arm to lean on might someday have to settle for the reassuring recesses of a robot.

An armless robot, known as Helpmate, will get its first test next year when it delivers meals from the hospital's commissary to nurses stations.

"It's a fairly sophisticated machine," said Joseph F. Engelberger, a researcher widely known as the father of the industrial robot and whose company designed Helpmate.

He envisions the robot rolling through the corridors, not only delivering meals to patients on special diets, but eventually collecting samples for the laboratory, retrieving medical records and walking patients. The robot will be able to understand simple commands, use elevators and otherwise navigate busy avenues.

"The machine has to be in communication with the nurses. The robot has got to know the whole hospital and, furthermore, it's got to see so that it doesn't bump into anyone."

Child dies after alleged beating

NEW YORK — A brain-dead 6-year-old girl who was kept alive by respirator after an alleged beating by her "family-oriented" adoptive father died Thursday. Authorities said both her parents would be charged with murder.

Elizabeth Steinberg, comatose and bleeding internally since police found her Monday in a filthy Greenwich Village apartment, died at 8:55 a.m. in St. Vincent's Hospital, said Ellen Borakove of the city medical examiner's office.

An immediate autopsy was planned, she said.

After two brain scans produced no results on Wednesday, the first-grader had been declared brain dead. Life support systems were disconnected Thursday, said hospital spokeswoman Barbara Franzese.

Figures from the city's Human Resources Administration indicate child abuse in New York has been steadily on the rise since 1981, with complaints of abuse or neglect involving a record 67,750 children were received last year.

Benoit fulfills promise

Off-campus government formed

By Shawn Dorsch
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate voted Thursday to allocate money toward a new form of off-campus student government. The senators gave $103.20 for 1,000 flyers and Collegian advertisements to promote the new Off-Campus Association.

The Student Governing Association is organizing the off-campus student government system, said Michelle Benoit, Student Senate chairwoman.

Benoit said even if the bill for the allocation would not have passed, the Off-Campus Association would still have existed as a University Activities Board (UAB) registered group — it would simply have been less publicized.

Doug Folk, Student Senate vice chairman, explained the purpose of the new group.

"We want to try to give students who live off-campus some sort of organized structure where they can get together and voice concerns about issues that affect them," he said.

Folk said the idea was a spin-off from a program that was tried a few years ago. He indicated the former program had "poor leadership, and the program flopped."

Originally, initiating some form of off-campus student government system was one of Benoit's campaign promises when she ran for 1987-88 student body president.

"Michelle realized she didn't need to be in office to get it done, and she still wanted it to happen," Folk said.

Benoit and Folk are helping the off-campus government program get started this semester.

"We want to try to give students who live off-campus some sort of organized structure where they can get together and voice concerns about issues that affect them."

—Doug Folk

A general meeting will be planned for any interested students, Benoit said. Those who attend the meeting can also decide if they would like to be a leader in the group by holding an office.

Benoit and Folk also indicated a one-time membership drive is being planned in conjunction with registration for the 1988 spring semester.

"We won't exclude anyone, a lot of people that live in residence halls now may live off-campus someday while they're attending school," Folk said.

Benoit said the government system for off-campus students will have a small group of officers. They will be elected by the members of the Off-Campus Association.

Under the former off-campus student government system, if a student lived off campus, Folk said, they were counted as a member.

"We want it to be more organized, just because you live off-campus doesn't mean you're automatically a member," Folk explained.

Folk said the off-campus student government system will not be able to vote at Student Senate meetings.

"A student senator will act as a liaison for them," Benoit said.

Folk explained "there will be no specific ties to student government," but there will simply be a subcommittee of student government.

Benoit said the Off-Campus Association intends to provide a means of disseminating information to the off-campus population. They may also schedule featured speakers who discuss the special situations facing off-campus students.

"Maybe they'll even decide to lobby for or against certain issues," Benoit said.

Folk said issues are not the main concern for the Off-Campus Association. He hopes the group will become involved in campus activities throughout the year.

"We want people to really feel a part of the University; we don't want them to feel alienated," Benoit said. "In this way, they can get together with others who share the same concerns."

Student Senate allocates funds for Off-Campus Association

By Jim Dietz
Collegian Reporter

The Union Big Eight Room was filled with student senators as both the newly elected Senate and the old Senate met Thursday evening.

"It was pretty relaxed since the old senators were running the meeting, but I would have been nervous if we had to do anything," said Cindy Riemann, a newly elected Arts and Sciences senator.

In Senate business, a special allocation of $103.20 was approved for the newly organized Off-Campus Association. The money will be used to advertise and form the new association.

"We hope (the Off-Campus Association participates) in homecoming, and maybe participates in some of the philanthropies that fraternities and sororities put together," said Michelle Benoit, Senate chairwoman.

Senate decided to allocate an additional $1,495 to Black Student Union. The money will help cover the costs of hosting the Big Eight Conference on Black Student Government. The spokesman said the funds were needed to cover a deficit and defray costs for the conference scheduled for February.

It was decided to postpone indefinitely the legislation "encouraging to maintain a responsible attitude toward alcohol and drug use" for student senators. The bill, designed to increase support for campus and community alcohol abuse prevention and drug education programs, received a mixed response.

"I think the timing on this bill couldn't be better, with Aggieville and everything, and I think it will send a message out," said Mark Bogina, graduate in geology.

Benoit said she believed a move in favor of the bill by senators would be hypocritical.

"Every student on campus knows the laws. I don't think it's our place to formulate how people should be thinking about (alcohol and drugs)," she said.

Senate also decided to establish an Athletic Ticket Sales Task Force in order to examine various policies and explore solutions to the problems related to athletic ticket sales.

The task force will be required to submit a final report to Student Senate no later than March 24, 1988.

27 ballots not originally counted

By The Collegian Staff

Due to an error by keypunch personnel, the computer data for the student government elections was not correctly generated. Sally Routson, director of student activities, said the change involves 27 ballots.

"It does change some of the numbers, but it doesn't change the official outcome," Routson said.

She explained the ballots were cast in the College of Engineering, yet coded for the College of Human Ecology. Therefore, the candidate numbers did not correspond and were left out of the vote totals.

The new totals for the three races affected are listed as follows:

Student Body President: Jack Taylor — 801, Troy Lubbers — 735, and Pat Muir — 603.

Board of Student Publications: Jeff Schrag — 1,129, Brian Howell — 1,003, Mindy Robert — 914, and Susan Hilt — 877.

Columnist's replacement enjoys week

To Whom This May Concern,

My name is Orville Sniggelfester Peedwatt-Shagnasty. I wish I were making the name up, but I am not. I am filling in for Jeff Schrag who is taking the week off. Apparently he is celebrating his 21st birthday, which falls on the midnight of the "Aggieville Riot."

I hope he isn't so stupid as to think he can start the riot, be placed under arrest and then get out of jail as a birthday present from the Fraternal Order of Police. The FOP never set birthday boys free as presents, they prefer to send flowers.

The picture to the right is not mine. Please give me more credit than that. The Collegian editorial page editor, who shall remain nameless, is just too stingy to take a picture that will only run in this issue. Just let me tell you that I am tan, charming and devastatingly handsome. Of course you can believe me — you read it in the Collegian. And, you may quote me on that.

All week long, while the Collegian advice columnist has been God knows where, doing heaven knows what, I have been sitting in his disgustingly clean office at his repulsively clean desk doing next to nothing. He must

Commentary

JEFF SCHRAG
Collegian Columnist

lead the most boring life outside of the physics department. All of the books on his shelves are arranged from the tallest to the shortest. What kind of a college student takes the time to spend an hour arranging his books? What kind of a college student cares? I am a decent man; I won't answer that. I just want to see the expression on his face when he comes back into the office and sees what I've done to his shelves. I imagine it would be pretty close to the look on Tammy Faye Bakker's face if she was told the world is all out of makeup — not a pretty sight!

So here I am, a chemical engineering major by choice and a substitute columnist by misfortune, spending a week just twiddling my thumbs. I have read and reread all of his fan mail. (Both letters were in the same handwriting and perfumed with bathroom deodorizer. I left them for him to answer, feeling they needed his personal attention.) I have thrown away all of his hate mail. (The janitor keeps one of those trash carts reserved especially for that purpose.)

But, I should not complain, I did have one phone call. "Hello, this is Orville," I said with excitement.

"Yes, I would like a medium, thin-crust pepperoni pizza with hot peppers and double cheese to go," she said with hunger.

I paused for an undecided instant before replying. "We'll have it ready in 30 minutes. That will be $22.87, and we only accept payment in gold nuggets. Thank you for calling Pizza Hut," I said with a snicker. It turned out to be the only telephone call I received all week, so I'm glad I made the most of it.

Most of the week — between mail duty, phone call(s) and paper airplanes — I pondered about what to write for the Collegian. I could have answered the advice letters that came in for Jeff, but what if my advice would lead someone to suicide, or even worse, to marriage. I could never live with myself. I could have written something about the upcoming Aggieville Riot, but this issue of the Collegian is full enough of riot writing.

Actually, to be quite honest, I haven't written anything of consequence since the final for my pseudo-composition course — Written Communication for Engineers. It was a good, one-page paper titled, "How I Plan to Spend My Christmas Vacation" by Orville Sniggelfester Peedwatt-Shagnasty. I even thought of reprinting it for this column, but my editor would not accept it. She said that since the paper was really only one line repeated over and over again, the readers would get bored after the first 10 or 20 lines. I personally thought the phrase, "Get lots of presents and watch lots of MTV" was highly accurate. In fact, my composition teacher said I did an amazing job of keeping to one dominant theme throughout the paper. It did get me a C, the highest grade in the whole class.

These last few days I have been looking through some of Schrag's old columns, to perhaps get a few story ideas. I didn't get any ideas about stories, but I did get an idea about him. I don't think he is on vacation. I think he has been committed to a mental institution for psychiatric evaluation. I just don't think a normal person could think of some of the things he writes.

Finally, I came up with an idea of my own. Since this is usually an advice column, I have decided to give everyone some advice on manners.

■ If you are going to get mauled by a pit bull terrier, it is not impolite to ask who he or she has mauled before you let the dog maul you. Pit bulls can carry the AIDS virus in their thirsty little jaws. One can never be too careful.

■ If you are ever hitchhiking, and the man who comes around to pick up dead farm animals stops to pick you up, it is not impolite to turn down his offer if he tells you he only has room in the back.

■ If you are ever asked to fill in for a columnist who will be on vacation, and you take pride in your sanity, it is not impolite to turn the offer down. I can think of many things I would rather do than spend an entire week worrying what to write in a column. One of them is playing nude football in a cactus patch with weight watchers anonymous.

Pre-festivity planning good, yet questionable

Considering the damage which has occurred after the previous two home football games between K-State and the University of Kansas, it's not hard to believe that merchants in the area want to put an end to post-game disturbances.

The Aggieville Merchants Association has held a series of meetings with city and University officials to form a set of guidelines for activity in the Aggieville area on Saturday. It is commendable these three groups are working together to prevent another disturbance.

Many of the guidelines which have been proposed — such as prohibiting traffic through the area and prohibiting people from being on roofs along Moro Street — are needed to help keep order in the area.

However, the Aggieville Merchants proposal to bar persons 17 and under from the area — beginning at 7 p.m. Saturday — is not only overreacting, it is more than likely unconstitutional.

Members of the Manhattan City Council have even expressed the opinion that barring minors from the Aggieville area is probably unconstitutional.

It is unfair to curtail the rights of one specific group — i.e., those 17 years of age and under — when there is no sound reason to do so. And the merchants have no reason for excluding this one specific group from the area.

Although the merchants in Aggieville have legitimate concerns about what happens Saturday night, they do not have the authority or the right to infringe on the personal freedoms of people who have not, as yet, done anything wrong.

Aggieville activities reflect on University

Games between K-State and the University of Kansas always draw big crowds and this year's 85th football game between the two schools is no exception. Reports from the football ticket office show sales are brisk for the game, so the crowd on Saturday in KSU Stadium should be one of the biggest this season.

However, there will be more spectators than just regular football fans here for the game.

One reason is that it is Parents Weekend, so many a proud mom and pop will be running around the Little Apple and the University seeing what kind of place they are sending their children to. People in charge of these weekend activities are reporting extremely good responses.

Also, during the weekend there will be several groups of visiting VIPs, including nationally known journalists for Journalism Day, regents members for a Board of Regents meeting and members of the state government, including Gov. Mike Hayden.

They will all be joining a large group of spectators, people from a large part of this region and the nation, for the weekend activities, especially Saturday afternoon and night. Yes, they will all be waiting for the Aggieville Riot/Near Riot Disturbance: Part III.

Remember last year when several television stations began their Friday evening newscasts live from Aggieville, all asking the same question — "Will there be a riot, again, this year?"

If a riot is what they anticipated, they were not disappointed. K-State won the game and then lost the battle of keeping a good reputation from being soiled. Whether there were any K-State people arrested, or even implicated, in the two previous incidents is not the point. The point is that K-State's name and its students are inextricably tied to this behavior.

This year it will not be any different, except more people will be watching. The difference is more people will be in Manhattan to witness any actions before, during and after the game firsthand, instead of reading about it in the papers or watching reports on the news Sunday. They will get to see Aggieville turned into a cage in case the animals get out of control, they will get to see a large number of law enforcement representatives from around the area ready to quell any violence before it starts and they might even get to see the ugly face of useless violence.

Due to the last two post-game incidents, measures have already been put into place for this year. Visitors will see the cage and extra police, but they might not see the violence. However, the only people who can control the third part of this are the people who go to Aggieville, or anywhere else, after the game.

Let's hope those watching the University and the city of Manhattan Saturday will see another great win by the Wildcats and a celebration befitting such a victory.

Letters

Leave your name

Editor,

To the person or persons responsible for placing on our vehicles the leaflet detailing the activities of the United States in the Persian Gulf.

First: If you are going to make accusations about the U.S. government, you should leave your name or the name of your organization, so that we can respond. We and probably many others do not know what I.M.O. stands for.

Second: You say that the U.S. government is feeding its citizens a "pack of lies." Give us proof so that we will understand and be able to evaluate your point of view.

Third: Assuming that you are Iranian, if you feel that the American government is that bad, you are free to leave whenever you wish — unless your government prefers that you stay with the "Great Satan."

Finally, we admit that Iraq started the war, but it seems they are also making an effort to bring it to an end. We wish that your government would follow the lead of the Iraqi volleyball team which presented an olive branch to the Iranian team a couple of weeks ago.

If you are so against this war and our country's involvement, you should initiate a dialogue with the Iraqis and the American people. By circulating a flier without your name or the name of your organization, you have given us a lecture that angered rather than informed us.

Not a game

Editor,

My response to Todd Rohr's letter in the Nov. 3 Collegian is explained in the following.

First and foremost, your analogy of the misfortunes of many K-State students to the sport of a game sickens me. It is not fun nor is it rewarding, as one might view a game to be. In fact, it is a life threatening reality for both the vehicle driver — who must suffer the consequences involved and live with the memory of the "foul," as you termed it, — as well as the victim — who also suffers, whether it be forever, a single day, or even worse, the last few moments of their life.

Secondly, your inference that pedestrians enjoy dodging vehicles and are gambling with their lives for excitement is way off base, so to speak. To participate in your "great pastime" of dodging, one would not "...need to be very physically fit and very quick." One would need to be very mentally unfit and very stupid! Contrary to your statement that crosswalks are "against the rules," they are for the good of the driver and pedestrian both, which I do believe most sane people observe.

Third, most vehicle drivers are not looking for a good excuse to hit a pedestrian, they are looking for a safe way to share the road space provided for both parties. It disgusts me that you could even joke that a driver could "get quite mad when the pedestrians...don't actually step in front of the car."

I, for one, am amazed at the contents of your letter because I've had the misfortune of being involved in an accident of this sort. I can tell you that there are no winners, only losers; no fun, only pain; and no laughter, only tears.

As for you, Rohr, I'll never understand what compelled you to write that letter that finds humor in something that causes so many people so much sorrow.

Economic reality

Editor,

We appreciate the story "Crash hits students where it hurts most..." in the Nov. 4 Collegian. We are glad when the general public can get some information about the Stock Market Game.

However, a couple of corrections need to be made. First, more than 600 teams at the elementary, high school and college level are playing the game this semester in Kansas. Second, buying and selling of stock does take place in a timely manner. When a team decides to make a transaction, they are given the price at the close of the market that day. So there are no losses suffered by players as a result of mechanical factors such as the computer card system. The game simulates economic reality very well.

College teams are welcome to play the Stock Market Game. The spring session starts on Feb. 12, 1988. For more information contact the Kansas State Center for Economic Education.

Out of line

Editor,

Hey, Dan Owens, you middle-of-the-road, wishy-washy twit, don't you think before you write? I am glad you have finally found something you enjoy writing about more than your pretentious visions of East Germany; but a reckless, and vulgar, column about Gov. Mike Hayden and a K-State administrative action is way out of line.

Some of your points about policies are valid, but to abuse the governor for his manner of speaking is no better than making fun of people because of the color of their skin.

If Hayden, or a member of his staff, happens to have read your column, perhaps it will have indicated the desperate need for improving higher education in Kansas.

Conference focuses on farm crisis

Groups meet to discuss difficulties

By Janette Poole
Collegian Reporter

The seventh annual Working with Families Conference addressed the impact of rural economic problems and the conditions of families and communities affected by the farm crisis.

"We had the opportunity to talk about 'what next,'" said Judy Dye, with the Nebraska Farm Crisis Hotline. "There have been changes in the last three to four years and the people responsible for those changes are at this conference."

The conference is beneficial because it pulls together all the different assistance organizations, said Kandi Ridenour, project coordinator for American Family Farm Foundation in Washington, D.C.

She added the conference is necessary for finding new solutions to problems others have experienced. "KSU should be commended for hosting the conference," Ridenour said.

The three-day conference, entitled "Rural Families in the Midwest," opened Tuesday in the K-State Union. It attracted more than 300 professionals from various farm programs. The seminar was hosted by the Family Center, the College of Human Ecology and K-State.

Sessions in the conference were presented by more than 80 professionals from 12 states. Topics included the impact of rural economic conditions, rural assistance programs, personal and business financial planning, churches in rural communities, family health care and community development concerns.

The sessions were designed to identify specific ideas and steps to be taken for assisting families and communities involved in the rural crisis. Professionals from rural human services, assistance agencies, social services, employment agencies and school officials were represented.

Production agriculture is a basic industry that sustains America, said Bob Youmans, vice president of South Carolina Farm Bureau.

However, it is in a crisis due to inadequate prices for crops, rising production costs and government interference, he said.

"Over 2,000 farmers are going out of business every week — nationwide," said Youmans.

For example, he said in his community there were 27 farmers in 1980 and now there are only five.

Youman discussed the feelings of loss and trauma a farmer faces when losing the farm. The sense of failing their family heritage is discouraging farming opportunities for future generations.

As a result of this stress, Youmans said there is "no joy on the faces in rural America."

He said there are increased cases of wife and child abuse, substance abuse, desertions of families and farms, and suicides.

"The farm crisis is bringing trauma... It has moved beyond families to rural businesses," said Youmans.

Producers have cutback purchases of equipment, supplies, quality food and clothing for their families, he said.

Approximately 25 people attended a question-and-answer session dealing with the farm credit system, bankruptcy and farm subsidies. A panel including members from two farm assistance programs and a lawyer answered their questions.

K-State will host the conference again next year.

Farmers' survival topic of lecture

By Janette Poole
Collegian Reporter

Changing and adapting to survive will have to be farmers' theory in order to survive the future, according to Sam Brownback, Kansas Secretary of Agriculture.

Brownback was the keynote speaker at the final luncheon address of the seventh annual Working With Families conference which concluded Thursday afternoon.

In Brownback's speech, he noted that the farm crisis is not over. However, he stated the present consensus is that Kansas agriculture is improving. For the first time since the crisis began, land is selling at above appraised values, Brownback said.

"Land prices are the key barometer...they are leveling off and even increasing," he said.

In addition to the increasing land prices, he cited exports and livestock sales as other reasons for agricultural recovery. Kansas receives 60 percent of its cash receipts from livestock sales.

While Kansas agriculture may be improving, Brownback said he is concerned about the recovery; ■ See SPEAKER, Page 16

Journalism Day guests feature alumnus, editor

By Nancy Hill
Collegian Reporter

Journalists and journalism faculty from across the state will have the opportunity to hear a K-State graduate and current executive editor of The Seattle Times as part of the Journalism Day activities Saturday.

Journalism Day activities will begin with a reception at 9 a.m. in the Union Little Theater which will include a brief address from President Jon Wefald. Following the reception, there will be a program featuring K-State graduate Michael Fancher, executive editor of The Seattle Times.

Fancher received his bachelor's degree at the University of Oregon, his master's degree from K-State and his Master of Business Administration from the University of Washington.

Before joining The Times as a reporter in 1978, Fancher worked for the Kansas City Star for eight years. He is also a member of the board of directors of the Associated Press Managing Editors.

The program, which is open to students, will also include presentations by Murrel Bland, last year's Kansas Press Association president, for the Kansas Newspaper Foundation and for Southwestern Bell. It is at this time that the winner of the photo contest for the cover of next year's Southwestern Bell telephone book will be announced. The finalists' photos will be on display in the Union on Saturday.

"Journalism Day gives us a chance to visit with people in the profession — people who we hope will hire our students," said Carol Oukrop, head of the journalism department.

More than 100 journalists from across the state are expected to attend Journalism Day.

Oukrop said the journalists are not necessarily K-State alumni. The invitation list was compiled basically from the Kansas Press Directory, the Kansas Broadcast News Directory and Kansas Press Women.

Oukrop said the department has been putting on a Journalism Day since before she began working at K-State in 1969. Journalism Day was known historically as Editor's Day, but the name was changed to Journalism Day to include broadcast news directors and Kansas Press Women.

K-State has not sponsored a Journalism Day for the past two years. In 1985, the department's 75th anniversary celebration took the place of Journalism Day, and in 1986 the funds were not available to sponsor the event.

"Frankly, last year we didn't have the money to have one," Oukrop said. "We couldn't have sent out the invitations."

Journalists will conclude their day's activities by attending the K-State football game against the University of Kansas.

Performances planned for Parents Weekend

By The Collegian Staff

Parents' Day weekend will offer students and their parents a variety of entertainment, beginning with the new 1987 KSU Showcase of Talent at 8 p.m. tonight in McCain Auditorium. Tickets will be for sale at the door for $2.50.

The talent contest is the replacement of University Sing, a fundraiser which the Sigma Chi Fraternity and the Interfraternity Council co-sponsored for the last 19 years to benefit the Sunset Zoo's improvement fund.

"When we lost the Interfraternity Council's support, we thought that might be the end of our big fundraisers," said Don Wixom, curator of education for Sunset Zoo. "But we found some businesses to give us some financial support to start up the new program."

Bushwacker's Fundrinkery, Junction City Distributing and KJCK Radio FM 94.5 are sponsors of the two-hour event, which features 16 acts.

The entertainers auditioned in September and October to earn a spot in tonight's show. Judges selected from the Manhattan and Junction City area will award grand prizes to contestants in five divisions: male vocalist, female vocalist, singing groups, comedy and instrumentalists.

"We think we'll have a good group of performers who will put on an excellent show," Wixom said. "Since this is our 20th year for fundraising with the Sigma Chi's, we think it's pretty important."

The show will be hosted by John Means, better known as Dr. Gonzo. Means has opened for such performers as the Doobie Brothers, and Huey Lewis and the News.

"We are really expecting a good turnout," Wixom said. "It will be a great activity for students to bring their parents and friends to. It should be a lot of fun for everyone."

Parents' Day activities on Saturday will include evening performances at McCain Auditorium and at the K-State Union.

A Parents' Day Show featuring comedian/juggler Edward Jackman will be presented at 7:30 p.m. in Union Forum Hall.

Jackman was voted the "1985 Campus Comedy Entertainer of the Year" by students and staff at more than 1,000 campuses throughout the country.

His one-man show combines comedy, juggling and audience participation. Tickets for the performance may be purchased for $3 at the door, or for $2 with every Parents' Day Buffet ticket purchased.

At 8 p.m., the K-State Singers and the Glee Clubs will present a concert in McCain Auditorium. The concert will consist of a variety of "light entertainment," said Gerald Polich, director of the music groups and associate professor of music.

Tickets for the concert, which are $5 for the general public and $3 for students, will be available today from noon to 5 at the McCain Auditorium box office and at the door the day of the performance.

Physics club hosts regional convention

By The Collegian Staff

Albert Einstein's Theory of Gravity is among the topics which will be discussed this weekend as the K-State Physics Club hosts the regional convention of the Society of Physics Students.

The main speaker of the conference is Clifford Will, physicist at Washington University in St. Louis. The title of his speech is "Was Einstein Right? Experimental Tests of the General Theory of Relativity."

"This weekend we're going to be focusing on his (Einstein's) theory of gravity. Probably the name associated with gravity, for most people, is Newton — Newton's Law of Gravity. Einstein developed really a radically different theory of gravity," said Larry Weaver, professor of physics.

The conference will also include tours of the physics research facilities at K-State, he said.

"We've got a dramatic expansion of the atomic collision laboratory that is nearing completion," Weaver said. This and other labs will be open for tours.

Weaver said research papers by K-State physics students will also be presented during the conference.

The conference will be held in Cardwell Hall. Will's speech will be 1:30 p.m. Saturday in Cardwell 103.

Group prepares for Dole's announcement

By The Collegian Staff

As a preview to U.S. Senator Dole's formal announcement of his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination, College Republicans and Youth for Dole sponsored a video program Thursday.

The promotional video was obtained from the national campaign headquarters, according to Scott Fischer, senior in psychology, for use with campus Republican groups. The documentary, "To the Stars Through Difficulty," began by recounting some of the events in Dole's life — from high school graduation to the Vietnam War to his long recovery from a war injury.

It also outlined his 27 years experience in the U.S. Congress, including highlights from his term as Senate Republican leader.

The K-State group of College Republicans finalized plans to car-pool to Dole's campaign announcement scheduled for Monday in Russell, Kan. The senator is scheduled to speak in his hometown around 9 a.m. before traveling to Iowa.

The College Republicans are also organizing an effort to distribute Dole campaign materials at this weekend's K-State-University of Kansas football game.

Dance Creations

Nancy Keyser-Shade, senior in dance, performs during a dress rehearsal for the dance concert "StudentDance" Wednesday evening.

Students utilize creative talents in choreographing dance pieces

By Nancy Hill
Collegian Reporter

K-State students will be given a chance to display their own dance works tonight at 8 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

The StudentDance production allows dance students the chance to choreograph and produce their own works.

"They don't just learn to perform, they learn organization," said Luke Kahlich, director of the dance program and associate professor of physical education, dance and leisure studies. "It's almost like an internship."

"We don't participate in our own work., student choreographer and senior in dance. It's easier for us to watch and see what's really going on while directing."

—Nancy Keyser-Shade

The concert, which is being presented for the third consecutive semester, will be divided into 11 different works and will involve 16 student dancers.

Student choreographers have been working since the beginning of the semester, creating their dances, selecting the dancers to perform them and directing the rehearsals.

"This is one time students do everything," Kahlich said.

Students were split into committees at the beginning of the semester and have been responsible for all aspects of the performance from publicity to costumes, he said.

"We don't participate in our own work," said Nancy Keyser-Shade, student choreographer and senior in dance. "It's easier for us to watch and see what's really going on while directing."

Patricia Durbin, junior in dance, applies makeup to Christine Rome, freshman in dance, prior to a final full dress rehearsal.

Students were given the freedom to create any type of dance, and according to Keyser-Shade, were not restricted in any way by faculty members.

Overseeing the production are Susie O'Brien, student coordinator and senior in dance, and Jeffery Groff, faculty adviser for StudentDance.

The performance will be in Purple Masque Theatre, a stage that offers choreographers a challenge because the audience is seated on three sides.

"I like the space...McCain is very overpowering to new choreographers. It's not an experimental space," Kahlich said. "Purple Masque is a place students can try anything out."

Tammy Francka, senior in dance, said the StudentDance concert has had a history of sold-out or nearly sold-out attendance.

"The first year we were sold-out both night; people had to sit on the stairs," Francka said.

The concert will last about 1½ hours, and will begin with a lecture demonstration about dance.

"To most people the act of choreography is mysterious, and the act of dance is a mystic," Kahlich said.

"We want to give the audience an idea of what we begin working with."

The StudentDance concert is only one of the concerts that the dance department produces each semester.

"We have the fullest production schedule of anyone in the state," Kahlich said. "A particular dance major has anywhere from 10 to 18 dances at the same time."

Some of the works performed at the StudentDance concert will be performed by the students at the Kansas Dance Festival in Wichita, Nov. 13, 14 and 15.

"I like the space...McCain is very overpowering to new choreographers. It's not an experimental space. Purple Masque is a place students can try anything out."

—Luke Kahlich

Performances which include such titles as "Seclusion," "Backbeat," "Wheel of Dreams," "Raisins," "Intertwine," and "Hidden," are choreographed by Francka, Keyser-Shade, Susan Dale, senior in dance; Sharisse Horn, junior in dance; Patricia Durbin, junior in dance and Amy Newton, senior in horticulture therapy.

Music accompanying dance selections includes Gloria Estefan and the Miami Sound Machine, Sam Harris, Paul Halley, Clearwater Revival and The Vancouver Symphony Orchestra.

Tickets for the StudentDance performance will be available at the door and are $3 for students and senior citizens and $4 for general public.

Violence in Aggieville: Pb

Aggie disturbance still haunts Robare

By Judy Lundstrom
Special Projects Editor

Saturday won't be an easy day for Catherine Robare.

What it will be is a painful reminder of an event one year ago that disrupted her lifestyle, physically and emotionally.

Robare's car was the one rolled and burned in front of the Varsity Theatre in Aggieville during the disturbance following the K-State-University of Kansas football game Oct. 18.

The incident occurred around 1 a.m. after Robare — who lived in an Aggieville apartment — parked her 1968 Volkswagen on Moro Street. It was the first time she had ever parked there.

And the last. She said she was kept awake during the night by loud noises down below and decided to go stay with a friend. When she went to get her car, however, she found a crowd smashing it in the street.

Moments later, she said, she climbed on top of the car in hopes of saving it. But people began yelling "Burn it, burn it," and she finally got down.

As she climbed down, she said, the car was rolled over and set on fire as the crowd cheered.

The following Wednesday, Robare was admitted to The St. Mary Hospital, suffering from overexertion. She returned home Friday, then went back to work the next week at a local convenience store.

She had to walk.

"So what if it was a piece of junk?" she said about her car. "It was my only means of transportation — it was my property. They had no right to destroy it."

The only insurance Robare had carried on her car was liability. Since then, it's been an uphill battle for Robare. But, she said, she's used to uphill battles.

Now 26, Robare moved to Manhattan from Lansing three years ago when her mother forced her to leave. Her father died shortly after, and she has been on her own ever since.

She quit her job at the convenience store a few days after she returned to work.

"I just couldn't do it," she said. "Winter was coming and I couldn't see myself walking every day. And people recognized me and were laughing about it."

Robare said after quitting her job, she unhooked her telephone for several days and trusted no one.

"I just gave up — I crawled into my apartment and was just going to disintegrate," she said.

After that, she spent a month at Memorial Hospital in Topeka, suffering an emotional breakdown.

"It was like I lost touch with reality," she said. "I'd start thinking that if stuff like this can happen, then how do I know that everything else is real and the whole world isn't corrupt?"

After returning to Manhattan from Topeka, Robare said she was immediately faced with finding a new apartment, a car and a job. She used the $2,000 donated by Manhattan residents to buy a car and pay her rent.

Finding a job was more difficult, she said, because she was uncomfortable being around college students.

"I've had trouble finding a job because of the resentment," she said. "It was hard to relate to the public after what happened."

After all she has been through, however, Robare said she doesn't want revenge on those who destroyed her car.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Part of a crowd in Aggieville turns over and later burns Catherine Robare's 1968 Volkswagen during the disturbance early on Oct. 19,

"They didn't realize what they were doing," she said. "The only person I blame is the guy who started it. It only takes one guy to start something, and then the rest of them will join in."

She said she had pity for those involved in the incident.

"I feel sorry for people who feel like they have to do things like that and can't find security in their own surroundings," she said. "I'm not against alcohol, just the fact that some people can't carry themselves when they get drunk. It's a shame innocent people have to pay."

1986, following the K-State-KU football game. Police arrested 22 people, including five K-State students and six KU students.

Robare said she had no idea what to predict for this year's post-football game situation. She did say, however, that she was glad more precautions are being taken.

"At least they're trying to do something and planning ahead," she said.

In the meantime, she said, she is trying to forget an incident that is still etched vividly in her mind.

"I think about it once in a while, especially when I go through Aggieville," she said. "But it's over. I've been through a lot of hell. This was just one more thing."

city.

"He (Conduff) can make any emergency decision he thinks necessary," Klingler said. "I can just tell you the City Commission will back him up 100 percent."

Conduff said as chief executive officer of the city, he has the power to make any decisions necessary to see that city ordinances are upheld.

Public Works Department employees will begin work at 8 a.m. Saturday, placing barricades to block off Aggieville streets to traffic, said Bruce McCallum, public works director.

At noon, city employees will begin installing barricades and snow fences to provide further control over the crowds entering Moro Street, McCallum said.

McCallum said the plastic fencing would be 6½ to seven feet tall. Johnson denied reports that a one-in, one-out access policy would be imposed once crowds became too large on Moro Street.

People will be denied admittance to Moro Street if they are carrying metal cans or glass containers, Johnson said. Access will also be denied to those who are obviously drunk, he said.

One reason Johnson said he believes the RCPD will be able to control the crowd in Aggieville is the increased manpower he will have.

In past years when "near riots" occurred, only 30 to 40 police officers were available to deal with thousands of people, Johnson said.

"It's ludicrous to think we'll be effective with those numbers," he said.

Johnson said he expects to have 80 to 100 officers within the eight-block area which comprises Aggieville. But not all the officers will be inside the fenced-in area, he said.

Most of the police in Aggieville Saturday will be RCPD officers, Johnson said. The duties those officers would normally be performing throughout the county will be taken over by 150 police officers from other counties and cities.

The additional police will be coming from the Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Department, the Kansas Highway Patrol, and the Wamego, Junction City, Wichita, KU and K-State police departments.

The county's cost for the additional police officers will be about $20,000, Johnson said.

Johnson said he has no plans to request the assistance of the National Guard if a repeat of last year's disturbance occurs.

He said the National Guard would only be used if the RCPD "got into a long, on-going type of situation" because of the time it takes the governor, who must order mobilization, to determine the National Guard is necessary and the time it takes to mobilize the troops.

"It ain't like on TV," he said.

Nor does Johnson plan to call on the Manhattan-Riley County Fire Department to use fire hoses to quell any violence that may occur.

"They wouldn't go down there anyway," Johnson said.

Johnson also considers the use of tear gas unlikely in the event of violence.

"Tear gas is not something to be taken lightly," he said. "But, if it becomes necessary, I won't hesitate to make the decision, given the situation."

Before tear gas would be used, however, Johnson said he would have to ensure that police officers would not be in the way of the gas.

Police activities in Aggieville will be coordinated from a headquarters and staging area in the City Hall Auditorium at 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue, Johnson said.

Two command posts will be established on the north and south sides of Aggieville, he said. The south command post, under the direction of Capt. Nick Edvy, will be in City Park. The north post will be under the command of Capt. Larry Woodyard. Both officers will report to Johnson.

Officials have also arranged for a media briefing room in the Nautilus Fitness Center, 1100 Moro. The briefing room will open at 5 p.m. Saturday with information on previous Aggieville incidents and plans for news briefings Saturday night.

During last year's disturbance, damage was caused by people climbing to the roofs of buildings along Moro Street and throwing bottles and cans into the crowd, Johnson said.

The Manhattan City Commission has since passed an ordinance making it illegal for people to be on those rooftops, he said.

"If people get up there, we'll just have to arrest them. We don't have time to fool around," Johnson said.

About 19 private security guards from Benchmark Security of Topeka have been hired by the Aggieville Merchants Association to guard the rooftops and entrances to Moro Street, said Bill Jacoby, the association's executive director.

Johnson said the guards will not be under his direction and will not be armed.

Jacoby said the cost for the private security force is in excess of $1,000.

Providing assistance to the RCPD in Aggieville places a great deal of stress on the K-State Police and its officers, said K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom.

"Logistically, it's a nightmare," he said.

Beckom said the nightmare occurs because the department has only 19 officers. From 8 a.m. Saturday until early Sunday morning, the department will be dealing with matters related to the football game. Those matters include security during the game, traffic control before and after the game and assisting the RCPD in Aggieville.

Beckom said nine to 12 officers will be assigned to Aggieville.

"There are some officers who are going to end up working nearly a 24-hour shift," he said.

Protecting the goalposts will be another responsibility of the K-State Police, Beckom said.

He would not reveal the measures being taken by the K-State Police to protect the goalposts.

"If anyone takes it upon themselves to violate the law or damage property, we'll do our best to see they have their day in court," Beckom said.

He said the additional duties performed by the department over the weekend will cost between $2,500 and $3,000.

Last year the 20-foot-high steel goalposts in KSU Stadium were replaced with 10-foot plastic uprights for the K-State-KU game. The steel goal posts are being left in place for this year's game, said Mike Jones, business manager of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Dignitaries to visit K-State Saturday

By The Collegian Staff

The eyes will be on Manhattan Saturday as a list of people ranging from the governor to the Kansas Board of Regents will be in town to participate in meetings and attend the K-State-University of Kansas football game.

Gov. Mike Hayden will speak at a pre-game luncheon that will include President Jon Wefald, KU Chancellor Gene Budig and presidents of other Regents universities, according to the K-State News and Information Office.

The Regents will be meeting at 9 a.m. in the Union to discuss their Margin of Excellence program with Hayden and Kansas legislators. The Margin of Excellence, approved by the Regents last June, represents a plan to revitalize the quality of higher education in Kansas. Regents believe it is necessary because state support for higher education has increased at a slower rate in Kansas than it has in surrounding states in the past several years.

The KSU political science committee, whose membership includes former governor John Carlin, endorsed the plan at an Oct. 3 meeting.

Hayden is also expected to attend the game, where he will present the Governor's Cup to the winning team.

Merchants plan to avoid damage

By Jennifer Dorsch
Staff Writer

In an effort to protect their businesses and the reputation of their shopping district, members of the Aggieville Merchants Association have developed a set of recommendations for Saturday.

The guidelines call for the closing of Aggieville to vehicular traffic; monitoring the pedestrian entrance; supporting law enforcement agencies in strict enforcement of laws; hiring an additional security force to assist local police; securing the rooftop areas; and having the street-cleaning crews begin working at 2 a.m. Sunday.

The guidelines also called for the merchants to make a coordinated effort to communicate the recommendations to the public prior to Saturday's game.

Last year, more than $50,000 in damage was caused to Aggieville businesses after the intrastate contest, Bill Jacoby, executive director of the Aggieville Merchants Association, said at a forum last month in the Union.

In spite of last year's events, the opinion of most merchants is an optimistic one faced with elements of concern for Saturday night's expected crowd.

Betteanne Iandolo, manager of Carousel, 1215 Moro St., said her home office has told her to board up the windows, but she hasn't decided if she will. Last year, several windows were broken and some merchandise was looted from Carousel.

Iandolo, a 1987 University of Kansas graduate, said she had been in Aggieville last year after the game, but didn't realize the extent of the damage.

"Back at KU, people always said they were afraid to be down here (in Aggieville) with 'KU' on their cars," she said.

As a manager, Iandolo said this is the first time she has really worried about the day.

"It's not so fun from the other side," she said.

Iandolo said that although she is a "little nervous" about Saturday, she doesn't think a disturbance will occur again.

Paying for the extra security is worth the protection, Iandolo said.

"The 'riot' has gotten to be popular enough that people would be down here ready to loot a store, but I don't think it's the students," she said.

Mark Modelmog, manager of Ballard's, 1218 Moro St., said a disturbance won't happen again because the situation is going to be handled differently this year.

"Everybody knew it was a mistake last year," he said. "The KU-K-State game could be a lot of fun. It's a shame people have to cause problems. Kids these days don't know how to handle themselves."

One of the tasks of the private security force, hired at a cost to the merchants of more than $1,000, is securing the rooftop areas. Keeping people off the roofs and keeping traffic out of the area will help with crowd control, said Mike Larimore, manager of Last Chance, 1213 Moro St.

Last year, employees of Last Chance kept people off their roof, but problems began when people gained access to the roofs of other buildings, Larimore said.

Problems occur when people on the roofs yell at people on the ground and start throwing things, then break a window, Larimore said.

Traffic through the area also caused problems last year when people in cars shouted to people on the street and people on the street threw things back at the cars, he said.

This year, traffic will not be allowed on the streets of Aggieville after 6 a.m. Saturday.

A net, similar to one used to stop footballs after field goal and extra-point attempts in professional football, will be in position to be pulled across the front of the patio at Last Chance if people begin throwing items, Larimore said.

"We like to make sure we don't cause problems anywhere else," he said.

Larimore said last year when things started getting out of control down the street from Last Chance, the emotion spread through the crowd.

"Nobody looks forward to the destructive end of these gatherings," he said. "The closer you get (to the violence), the scarier it gets."

Larimore said the rules for Aggieville are set before people go in, and everyone should act accordingly.

"There's no reason for people to think it's not going to be fun in Aggieville," he said. "Nobody wants anything to happen. Just because there are 6,000 people in Aggieville doesn't mean it's an uncontrollable mob."

John Heritage, owner of several Aggieville establishments, is one of many Aggieville merchants who hope things go smoothly Saturday.

The damage Aggieville has suffered in the past has been directly caused by the city not being prepared, said John Heritage, owner of several Aggieville establishments.

KU shares concern, but sees dilemma as 'K-State problem'

By Deron Johnson
Editor

On the two Sunday mornings following the 1984 and 1986 Aggieville disturbances, the Lawrence and Manhattan communities provided a study in contrasts. While one city quietly slept, the other picked up the pieces of a horde's rampage.

While one was melancholy over a football loss, the other contemplated the meaning of a bittersweet victory. One asked questions; the other demanded answers.

For the University of Kansas, the ramifications of the past two Aggieville melees have been minimal, save a few battered egos or, even, faces. However, student leaders and administration officials at the universities agree the Aggieville dilemma is a shared one.

"It is a concern here," said Jason Krakow, KU student body president. "We don't want people to think 'street violence' when they go to K-State."

Almost as an afterthought, Krakow added, "We're encouraging people to take hard hats with them to protect them."

While Krakow tempered his hard hat advice with a sprinkling of sarcasm, the recommendation nonetheless carried a serious undertone.

"People need to be aware of the possible danger," he said. "Telling people to take hard hats is my way of saying, 'Look, don't be naive to the fact that a riot — if you want to call it that — has gone on (twice in the last) three years and to be careful out there.'"

Although both universities' student senate members pondered the Aggieville problem last spring, Krakow said the issue is not a major concern among his senators.

"I think there's not a lot we can do other than try to get people to control themselves," he said. "Kent (Bradley, K-State's student body president) and I have talked a lot about it and we've worked in circles to say this isn't something to be laughed at."

Although Krakow doesn't believe KU students come to Manhattan with the express purpose of destroying Aggieville, he does think most KU students don't view the problem as their concern.

"People perceive it — justifiably or non-justifiably — as a K-State or Manhattan problem," he said. "I don't think people go there with the intention of trashing the place."

Stephanie Quincy, KU's student body vice president, said the two teams' unimpressive records may put a damper on this year's festivities.

"It's always a big rivalry," she said. "I think this year, because our football team is so bad, no one is too enthused."

She added, however, that most of those who are making the 80-mile trip to Manhattan are coming to celebrate.

"Believe me, no one is (going to Manhattan) to see the game," she said.

To her knowledge, few students are planning to ransack Aggieville.

"I don't go over there with the idea of inciting a riot or anything," she said.

Like Krakow, Quincy believes KU students perceive the Aggieville situation as strictly a Manhattan problem.

"The general feeling I get is, yeah, it kind of is K-State's problem," she said. "It's like having a party at somebody else's house. You don't worry about spilling beer because you don't have to clean it up."

Quincy, who said there has been no formal discussion of possible actions if another disturbance occurs this year, believes a stop to the violence is imperative.

"I think we need a year without a riot," she said, adding that the number of law enforcement officers scheduled to be in town has discouraged the heartiest of partiers.

"I think the people who were going to go over there and raise absolute hell have gotten the message that it won't be possible — at least not in Aggieville," she said.

Despite the apparent general lack of student concern, Ann Eversole, director of KU's Organizations and Activities Center, said KU has a vested interest in ensuring that past violence doesn't repeat itself Saturday night.

"I think any time there's a problem like that, there's a negative reflection on both institutions," she said. "I think it's real unfortunate."

That tone was echoed in a letter jointly written by KU Chancellor Gene Budig and K-State President Jon Wefald and sent to the Kansas State Collegian and University Daily Kansan.

Situation not new Rivalry provokes partiers

By Brad Fanshier
Collegian Reporter

"The police finally blocked off Aggieville to traffic. About this time, the first fires were started near the AV Newsstand building on 12th. Police put the fires out. They handcuffed one young man and led him away. The crowd surged with excitement. 'Kill the pigs,' shouted one youth. 'Let's start a riot,' another one said."

This sounds like it could be a news report from Aggieville after last year's K-State-University of Kansas game, but it isn't.

Nor is it from 1984.

Nor 1982, for that matter.

The paragraph is from a Manhattan Mercury front page article dated Monday, Oct. 16, 1972.

The headline over the the article asked, "It couldn't happen again, could it?" Not only could it happen again, it did.

What happened in 1972 was not a new phenomenon even then. Reports of violence, property damage and mass inebriation in the streets of Aggieville can be found after almost every major home football victory, including a 1969 defeat of the University of Oklahoma, 59-21.

In 1972, the Wildcats were on a long dry spell against the Jayhawks, having not won at home since 1954. The 20-19 win started a celebration of an estimated 3,000 people, according to the Kansas State Collegian and the Mercury.

Parties climbed onto buildings, broke bottles and windows, bent signs, and started fires on Moro Street. Though the Collegian described it as "pandemonium," only three people were arrested: one for assaulting an officer and two for publicly smoking marijuana.

The next disturbance, called the "assault on Aggieville" by the Collegian, occurred in 1978.

Once again, bottles, street signs and store windows bore the brunt of the crowd's activities. Bonfires were lit at each end of Moro Street in Aggieville, according to the Collegian. The article said police estimated the damage at $500. Five arrests were made that year, including two for criminal damage to property and one for disorderly conduct. Also, the goalposts were missing from KSU Stadium.

The Mercury's account of the night's activities quoted Lawrence Blaker, owner of the Studio Royal in Aggieville at the time.

"For the last 30 to 40 years, we've tried everything in the world to slow down these types of celebrations, but there isn't really anything you can do," Blaker told the Mercury.

Authorities were again given the chance to "slow down the celebration" in 1982.

The first line of defense was the greasing of the goalposts at the stadium — a vain attempt, according to the Collegian. The celebration quickly progressed to the streets of Aggieville.

The crowd in 1982 remained mostly peaceful, as had been the case in previous years. But trash cans, street signs, bottles and store windows were subject to the usual treatment. Officers issued tickets to those who were urinating in the street, thereby "creating a sanitation nuisance."

In 1982, Collegian features editor Dana Neal wrote "the Aggieville streets and businesses probably couldn't survive the ravages of the victory activity more than once every four years."

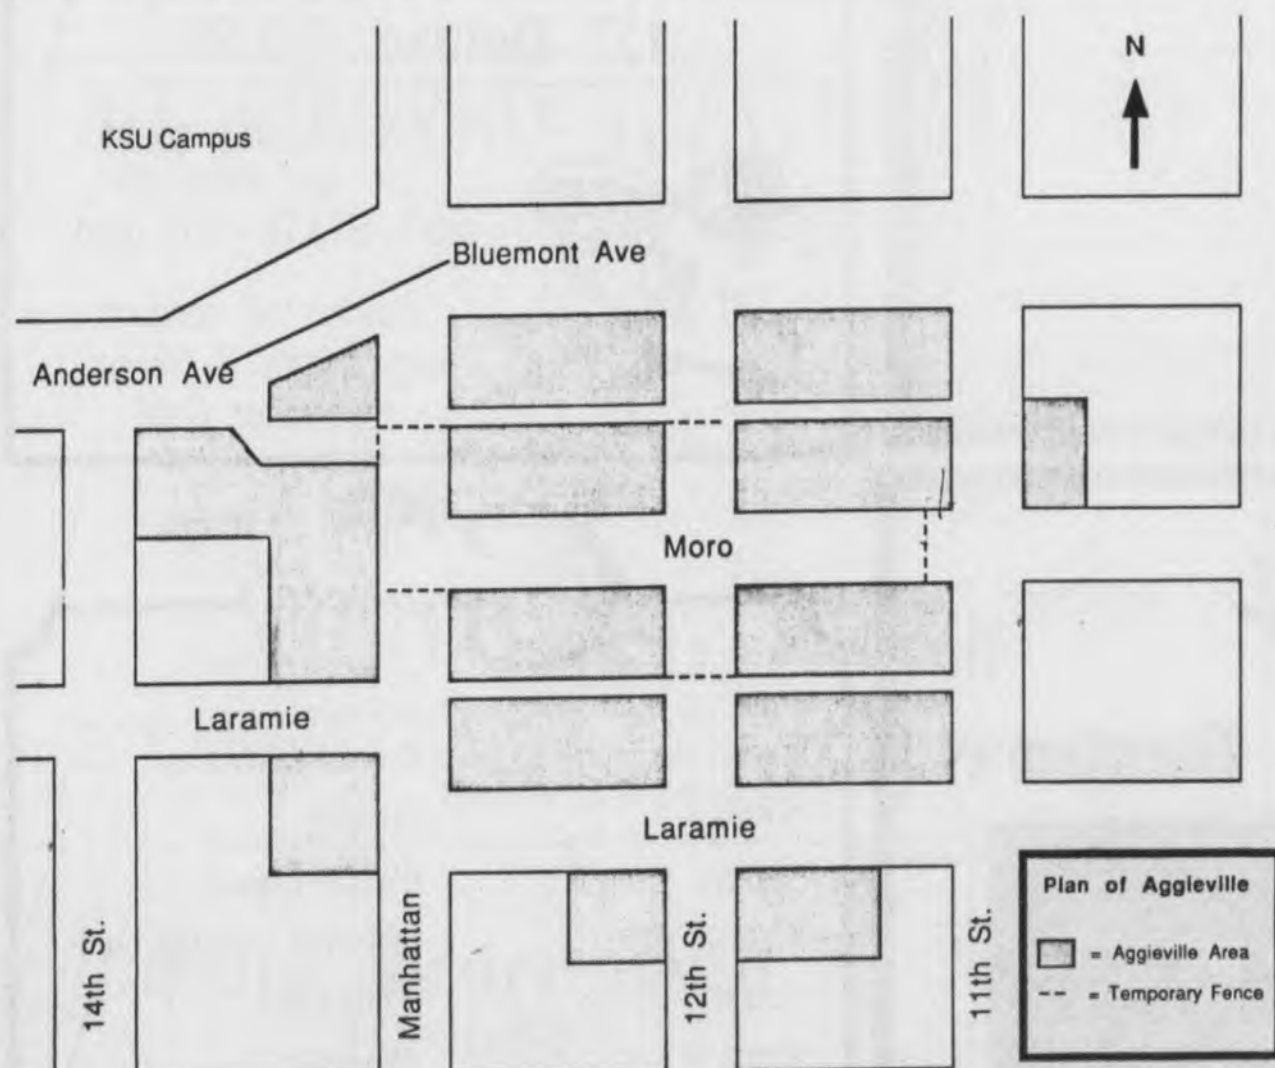

That sentence proved to be prophetic.

The crowd that gathered after the 1984 victory turned violent, injuring seven police officers and causing 15 K-State students to be arrested, according to the Collegian. Crowd energy that in the past had been directed toward signs, buildings and trash suddenly shifted to Riley County Police Department officers. Some of the officers were chased, cornered and made targets for bottles and rocks.

Some of those quoted in the Collegian blamed the violence on the use of Mace by University officials in defense of the goalposts after the game. Others said it started when partiers tried to steal the caps and nightsticks of officers in Aggieville that night.

Two years later, the focus was back on property, but to a much greater extent than it ever had been. Nearly every store in the district suffered damage from the crowd.

A 1968 Volkswagen, owned by Catherine Robare and parked on Moro Street, was overturned and burned by the crowd.

Arrests pervade previous 'riots'

By The Collegian Staff

For those who anticipate drinking in Aggieville this weekend, beware. Records show the police are not hesitant to arrest peace disturbers.

During and after the 1986 Aggieville disturbance, Riley County Police Department officers arrested 22 individuals for criminal damage, theft and burglary. Police photographers took photographs, which led to three of the arrests.

Among those arrested were five K-State students and six University of Kansas students. The remaining people arrested were students from The Wichita State University, Hesston College, Emporia State University and Manhattan High School, according to a report issued by the University Relations office.

Of the 22 original arrests, 21 resulted in convictions, said Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy.

"I think what's important was there was a whole lot of money and a whole lot of time spent in jail," Kennedy said. "The whole thing was just foolish. I would like for them to think about how they're going to face their parents on Monday after doing something foolish."

For some individuals, last year's convictions resulted in jail sentences in excess of 100 days, he said. One student spent his days at classes on campus and his nights in jail.

All arrests except one were for misdemeanors, said Les Bieler, assistant director of the RCPD.

"The only felony was when a fellow kicked a window out," Bieler said.

Patrons to spend $1.5 million here

Activities over weekend to generate business

By Janet Swanson
Agri/Business Editor

$1.5 million.

That's what the 15,000 visitors that are expected on campus this weekend mean to the Manhattan area.

Besides the visitors, 5,000 students and 15,000 local people will participate in the weekend activities that include the K-State-KU football game, Journalism Day, Parents Weekend and the Board of Regents meeting.

Bill Boyd, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said $498,750 will be raised in ticket sales for the K-State-KU football game and more than $1 million in food, lodging, transportation and shopping.

"It's all spent in the Manhattan area and goes back into the Manhattan economy," Boyd said. "It's like this every year."

But, what does the influx of people mean to the area? Try getting one of the 611 hotel rooms in Manhattan for Friday and Saturday night. Or better yet, even one in Junction City.

"Us? We've been booked since December 1986," said John Peterson, associate general manager of the Holiday Inn & Holidome. Since then, the hotel has given more than 1,000 denials to prospective customers. Denials that Peterson hopes won't affect future business.

"We're usually full for every home Big Eight Conference game. Non-conference games are real iffy, but this one is always full," he said.

Other managers of hotels in Manhattan say it's business as usual.

"We don't have any real problems here. We get a lot of exposure from the market within the state of Kansas," said Jon Driscoll, All Seasons general manager.

Driscoll said All Seasons has been booked for about eight weeks, but on weekends of conference games hotels usually fill.

Most of the people who stay at the University Inn are returning customers, said Dan Richards, general manager.

"The KU game always books up first. No matter when it is," he said. The University Inn has been booked for both Friday and Saturday night since late spring.

The Sunset Motel, Liberty Inn and Harvest Inn, all in Junction City, are full for the weekend.

"Quite a few of our reservations are from parents. I don't believe anything special will be needed," said Theresa Ragain, general manager of the inn.

"I think we've got it all down to a science. They don't like to wait in lines (at the restaurant) so we will be having buffets," Peterson said.

But, Peterson and Richards agree that basketball games and other sports don't have the same affect on their business.

"We get some business from basketball, but not that much. Most of the people that have tickets to it live in town," Richards said.

Peterson said Holiday Inn's fall conventions are scheduled around home football games. "We do get some business (from other sports), but not anywhere near what we have for football," he said.

"There are some problems when the (football) schedule gets changed. We have to do some shuffling to make it work," he said.

'Challenges' face Riley in new job

By Debbie Lyons
Collegian Reporter

"Tremendous opportunities and challenges" face Jack Riley, professor of animal sciences and industry, with his appointment to the head of his department.

Riley was chosen from a field of 23 applicants to replace Don Good, who is retiring Nov. 18. Riley will assume his duties that same day.

He will supervise about 242 employees including faculty members and support personnel. There are approximately 85 graduate and 335 undergraduate students in the animal sciences and industry major, he said.

"Our department is already one of the top in the nation; we just need to keep it on top," Riley said.

Riley said his administrative philosophy is similar to Good's.

"(I want to give) guidance and direction, but let the individual faculty member be responsible to outline programs and be innovative," he said. "We have a tremendously diverse program."

The department is comprised of teaching, research, extension and international agriculture. One of the things Riley said he will concentrate on is maintaining a balance between basic and applied research.

Applied research is related to producer and commodity groups.

"We want commodity groups to feel like we are serving them, but we have to do enough basic research for our peers to recognize our capability," Riley said.

Jack Riley, professor of animal sciences and industry, was appointed to the head of the department. Riley was chosen from a pool of 23 applicants and will take office when the former head retires Nov. 18.

With the renovation of Weber Hall and the meats laboratory, the developing meats program is going to offer tremendous opportunities and challenges to the whole faculty, he said.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture is relocating the Food Safety Inspection Agency headquarters to a college campus and K-State is in the final running for the site, Riley said. That would bring great challenges to the faculty, he said.

Riley has been at K-State for 16 years as a teacher and researcher. He was the coordinator of the Beef Research Unit and coordinator of research for the department for the last three years. Prior to coming to K-State, he was a full-time instructor at West Illinois University for three years.

Southern forest fires scorch 100,000 acres

By The Associated Press

Firefighters battling Southern forest fires that have raced across more than 100,000 acres got discouraging news Thursday from weather forecasters, who predicted high winds and no rain for several days.

Winds carried burning leaves across fire lines and "conditions are deteriorating every day," said Bruce Jewell, a spokesman in the U.S. Forest Service's regional office in Atlanta. Many of the fires were blamed on arson.

Rain "is the only thing that will bring this to a conclusion," Jewell said.

But no rain is in sight for the region until Sunday, said National Weather Service forecaster Max Blood.

"It doesn't look good because of the cooler and dry air that's moving in. ... It's not to say that the storms aren't out there. They're just missing the Southeast for some reason right now," Blood said.

Adolfe Sax remembered

Creation of saxophone celebrated

By Corbin Novolny
Collegian Reporter

A celebration is taking place this week and next week for the 173rd birthday of Adolphe Sax, a Belgian instrument maker and inventor of the saxophone.

Sax, born in Dinant, Nov. 6, 1814, came from a family of 11 children. In 1840, he got an idea for a new instrument that would have a bass sound. It was small at the top, bigger at the bottom and activated by a single reed. A similar instrument, the clarinet, was being used at this time. On July 22, 1846, Sax patented his invention in Paris.

His invention was immediately supported by two groups — the military and orchestral bands. The military bands wanted the saxophone because of its power. The saxophone filled a bass sound that wasn't there, and had more of a projection than the other instruments. Tubas were not used at the time.

The orchestral bands also needed a sound to fill the bass void. Hector Berlioz, a respected French composer, was looking forward to the new invention. Berlioz composed several songs for the saxophone and helped put the saxophone into families ranging from the soprano to the bass.

In the 1920s, the United States was entering a new era. The recording industry was just forming and a saxophone was occurring. A saxophone player named Rudy Wiedoeft was making the new instrument popular. The jazz age hit and the saxophone was starting to replace the clarinet. People liked the different sound it had and the bottom voice it produced.

"The saxophone changed a lot of peoples' ideas about music."
—Alfred Cochran

"There was definitely a saxophone craze in the country. There were laws in certain places in Kansas that you couldn't play the saxophone past 11 at night," said Alfred Cochran, assistant professor in music.

"The idea was that it was such a seductive sound that it would lead all the young ladies to corruption," he said.

"The saxophone changed a lot of peoples' ideas about music," he said. "There are cases where people actually committed suicide because they were unable to fit in with this new craze that was sweeping the country."

K-State is going to help honor Sax's birthday by presenting a free concert at 8 p.m. tonight in All-Faiths Chapel auditorium. Leading saxophonists across Kansas will gather to perform in this concert.

Those involved are Thomis Tiley from the University of Kansas, Kenneth Ticknor from Washburn University, Ben Rohrer from Cloud County Community College, and from K-State, Frank Sidorfsky, associate professor in music, and Cochran.

Ballet company to display talent on McCain stage

By The Collegian Staff

The State Ballet of Missouri, under the artistic direction of internationally acclaimed choreographer Todd Bolender, will perform at 8 p.m. Monday, November 9 in McCain Auditorium.

The company of 28 dancers, formerly the Kansas City Ballet, will perform four ballets from their repertory.

Two ballets by George Balanchine, "Pas de Dix" and "Divertimento," will be featured.

"Pas de Dix" pays homage to the tradition of Russia's celebrated Maryinsky Theatre and was inspired by Balanchine's recollections of his student days there.

The highlight of the State Ballet's performance will be "Divertimento," a ballet which was once considered "lost." This piece was dropped from the repertory of the Ballet Society (as the New York City Ballet was originally called) in 1952. It was thought to be "lost" because it was believed that no one remembered the steps. The State Ballet of Missouri is now the only company that performs "Divertimento."

"A Summer's Day" by Bolender, and "Con Amore" by Lew Christensen will also be performed at McCain.

Sports and jazz are combined in "A Summer's Day," to form a lighthearted tale of four brash boys.

The evening will conclude with "Con Amore," the tale of a thief who runs afoul of a band of Amazons, each of whom falls in love with him; and of a faithless wife whose husband catches her with her lovers.

Tickets for the performance are $12-$16 for the general public and $9-$13 for students and senior citizens.

Play parallels struggle of Latin America

By Stacey Schumacher
Collegian Reporter

The sights and sounds of the Orinoco river came to Kansas Thursday night as the Theater/Teatro performed "Orinoco" in McCain Auditorium.

Carmen Zapata and Ivonne Coll as Mina and Fifi, respectively, took the audience with them as they drifted along the exotic South American river.

Two somewhat faded showgirls, Mina and Fifi are aboard an old, dilapidated steamboat, sailing down the river to perform for the crew of an oil camp.

Play Review

The play opens with Mina celebrating the dawn and wondering in amazement at life along the river. Fifi, who is reluctant to get out of bed, is finally persuaded by Mina to wake up and appreciate the beauty of the morning.

Fifi's energy is realized when she opens her eyes fully and is completely amazed and taken by the beauty of the morning. Fifi is an eternal optimist, describing the sun as her spotlight. She continues to look for the bright side of everything, even against the pessimistic remarks of Mina.

Their journey is interrupted when they discover the crew of the ship has mysteriously disappeared. The play centers around the efforts of these two women to determine what has happened to the crew and to understand the situation in which they now find themselves.

Fifi views their situation as two artists who survive on a mystery boat, while Mina describes it as two hookers who survive on a beat-up, old tub.

Although opposing personalities, the two women have a warm and strong relationship. Zapata and Coll were excellent in communicating the strong love and support which exists between Mina and Fifi.

As the women attempt to steer the boat and gain some control of their situation, there is a notable comparison to Latin America and its attempt to gain control of its situation in today's world. The women seem to be drifting aimlessly, unsure of their future. So, too, does Latin America seem to be drifting, unsure of its destiny and facing an unclear future.

The play closes powerfully, with Mina and Fifi embracing one another in a thunderstorm. As Mina cries that there is confusion and darkness, Fifi cries back: "Look, we are on our way, and the best is yet to come."

'Cats, Kansas preparing for annual war

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

Oklahoma vs. Nebraska. Sugar Ray Leonard vs. Marvelous Marvin Hagler. The Gunfight at the OK Corral.

Enough of the comparisons. K-State is challenging the University of Kansas on the football field. War has been declared for 1:30 p.m., Saturday, at KSU Stadium.

Battle lines were established as early as two seasons ago when Coach Stan Parrish began his tenure at Manhattan and Bob Valesente became head football coach at Lawrence.

Parrish immediately began a blitz of "I hate KU" comments. That attitude, Parrish said, wasn't hard to obtain even though he is a native of Parma, Ohio.

"We had been beaten badly (35-7 in 1985 at Lawrence) before I got here and it didn't take long to meet people out there and on the alumni swing to realize the importance of the game," Parrish said.

Valesente, on the other hand, took a different approach.

"K-State is in the same category as all our other games on the schedule. This game is only big because it's the game this week," Valesente said before last year's matchup.

The result? Kansas had four turnovers as the Wildcats whipped the Jayhawks, 29-12.

This year Valesente has taken a different approach. Before the season got underway, KU's coach listed Missouri and K-State as teams the Jayhawks had to beat.

"(K-State has) a coach who has verbally insulted our football team, and I'm sure our players will be ready for (the Wildcats). Stan has given us enough bulletin board material to take care of us for several years," Valesente said.

Parrish is in no way downplaying the rivalry, but he has let the media do the talking for him.

"We had major stories about what I had supposedly said during the course of the year," Parrish said. "The media has done all the talking for me before I ever talked to anybody this week about the game."

It also helps when secretaries answer the phone by saying "Wildcat football, beat KU." There's also a poster in the football office that says "Rock, Chalk, Chicken Hawk, Stomp KU."

"I love rivalries. I think they're great for college football," Parrish said. "I wanted to rekindle the emotion of the rivalry, and I guess I've obviously done that."

It might remind some fans of former K-State and Kansas coaches Vince Gibson and Pepper Rodgers battling it out in the late 1960s and early '70s. What's different is the quality of the teams.

K-State enters the game 0-8 overall and 0-4 in the Big Eight Conference. Kansas is 1-7 and 0-4, with its only win a 16-15 decision against Southern Illinois. About all that's at stake is avoiding cellar position in the Big Eight and the Governor's Cup trophy.

Records, though, do not diminish a rivalry of this magnitude.

"I obviously hadn't planned on going in 0-8, but I think regardless of our record, I would feel the same way about the game...and always will," Parrish said.

If all the media hype wasn't enough, K-State's managers and trainers have been playing KU's fight song during workouts at KSU Stadium.

"I'm sick of hearing that stuff," offensive guard Matt Garver said. "I don't want to hear any of it Saturday."

Tailback Tony Jordan, who led both teams in rushing last year with 98 yards, said K-State is ready for combat.

"As a team, we have something to prove," Jordan said. "We're all fired up. Right now, we just have to be physically prepared and properly rested. The basic element, though, is whoever wants it the most will win."

Kansas is led offensively by tailback Arnold Snell. The 6-foot-0, 200-pound junior has 414 yards, and carried the ball 29 times in KU's 71-10 loss to Oklahoma. It was the biggest rushing attempt for a Hawk since Kerwin Bell rushed 38 times in 1980 against K-State.

Kelly Donohoe, a 5-foot-11, 175-pound sophomore from Harrisonville, Mo., is the starting quarterback. Donohoe lost the starting nod the fourth game of the season, but worked his way back into the lineup three weeks later.

Kansas' top receiver is Willie Vaughn. The 5-11, 185-pound junior wide receiver caught a 30-yard touchdown pass against Oklahoma and a 98-yarder for a TD against Colorado.

Defensively, middle linebacker Curtis Moore paces the Hawks with 81 tackles.

NOTES: Kansas leads the overall series 56-24-4...K-State is looking for its first back-to-back win in the series and has won the last three games in Manhattan...Familiar faces: KU defensive coordinator Dave Dunkelberger coached at K-State from 1975-77 and Cat linebacker coach Rich Rachel coached at Kansas from 1979-82...KU defensive end Stacey Henson and K-State defensive back Robert Easterwood are cousins.

K-State Head Coach Stan Parrish hopes to be kissing the Governor's Cup again Saturday with a victory against rival University of Kansas. The Wildcats will be trying for consecutive wins against the Jayhawks for the first time in 32 years.

Sports Briefly

Rugbers to play 2 matches

K-State's rugby teams will play two matches Saturday at Gorman Park in Manhattan against the Johnson County rugby club's A- and B-sides. The A-side match is a Heart of America Division I club level merit table match.

K-State will be using a different type of strategy in the match, sending their full collegiate side against the Johnson County club team.

"Because we're playing our most important collegiate match of the year next week against (the University of Kansas), we are going to play our best collegiate side to get them ready," said team selector and former head coach Greg Barnes. "The KU match will decide which team advances to the Midwest regionals. It's really a biggie for us."

K-State to retire jersey No. 11

In addition to Parents' Day, Saturday will also be "Purple Pride Day" at KSU Stadium.

K-State will retire jersey No. 11 in honor of former Wildcats Lynn Dickey and Steve Grogan. Dickey wore No. 11 from 1968-70, while Grogan donned it from 1972-74. Both went on to play in the National Football League.

A reception honoring Dickey and former K-State coach Vince Gibson will be held at 5 p.m. today at the University Inn. Grogan will be unable to attend the festivities since he is currently on the New England Patriots' roster.

Soccer team to host Nebraska

K-State's soccer team is scheduled to play two games this weekend. The Wildcats host Nebraska at 2 p.m. Saturday in Memorial Stadium and are slated to play Sunday at Lawrence against the University of Kansas.

Lady Cats plan scrimmages

The K-State women's basketball teams is well underway into the 1987-88 basketball season with 20-plus days of practice out of the way. In the next few weeks, they will get a chance to start playing in front of spectators as several intrasquad scrimmages are planned.

"We have been impressed with how much we have accomplished with such a young group," Coach Matilda Mossman said. "I think we have progressed a lot more quickly than we had anticipated."

The Lady Cats will begin their scrimmages when they play Nov. 14 at Topeka. K-State is scheduled for an 8 p.m. start following the Washburn Lady Blues' scrimmage at Lee Arena.

Freshman Diana Miller will be on a familiar court as she returns home when the Lady Cats scrimmage on Nov. 19 at Buhler High School in Hutchinson, Kan. The Lady Cats are scheduled for a 7 p.m. start in Hutchinson.

Goal posts not replaced for rivalry

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

K-State athletic director Larry Travis promised that there won't be a situation as in 1984 when fans trying to tear down the goalposts following the K-State-University of Kansas football game in Manhattan were sprayed with Mace by members of the K-State police.

All he wants is for the fans to show some respect and to be careful.

"We're not going to...take pictures of people or do anything like that. We're not going to be...in a confrontation mode. We're not going to stand there in our battle gear and helmets," Travis said.

"All we're asking for is the fans not to (tear down the goalposts); not to make a big deal about it," he added.

In preparation for last year's contest, K-State installed plastic goalposts which cost about $50 each and weighed 200 pounds apiece. The goalposts have not been replaced for this year's matchup and are taller than those used last season due to National Collegiate Athletic Association rules.

As a result, the steel and concrete standards are more expensive — approximately $6,000 each — and weigh as much as 1,800 pounds apiece. That's what has Travis worried.

"I don't want it to happen because...I'm afraid someone is going to get hurt," Travis said.

Travis said a woman at the University of Harvard was struck by a falling goalpost and lapsed into a coma for 20 days.

"And that can happen here," he said. "Tearing down the goalposts doesn't serve any purpose. You can jump up and down, and yell and scream, and all of those things. But it doesn't do any good to take those goalposts out of the stadium."

K-State received a verbal reprimand from Big Eight Conference officials last year when fans stormed the field with 28 seconds left in the annual rivalry.

If it happens again, Travis said the Wildcats could be penalized by game officials and the University could face stiffer penalties from conference officials.

Added security is being planned and Travis said a pregame announcement will be made, stipulating that anyone moving onto the field before the game is completed is subject to removal from KSU Stadium.

"If (the goalposts are torn down), it happens. Hopefully, if it happens, it's going to be after the game and after the teams have left the field," Travis said. "And if (the goalposts) leave the stadium, at sometime (persons removing the goalposts) can get arrested."

Stadium officials have also been instructed to strictly enforce the container policy which has been in effect this season. Individuals entering KSU Stadium are permitted to bring small, non-breakable thermoses.

The small containers will be subject to a contents' check and will be confiscated if they are found to contain alcoholic beverages. Individuals possessing alcohol in the stadium will be evicted from the stadium.

Also, stadium gates will be manned the entire game with no individuals admitted into the stadium without a ticket or proper credentials.

Though an estimated crowd of 30,000 to 35,000 is expected to attend the Sunflower State matchup, Travis expects no problems. He said he hopes the fans will do what Coach Stan Parrish has been asking for during the entire season — make a lot of noise.

"Now, we're going to have a decent crowd. We need to make KSU Stadium just like Ahearn Field House this week," Travis said. "We need to make Kansas (ask), 'Holy smokes, what have we got ourselves into?'"

NBA begins 42nd season tonight

Former Celtic star resumes coaching career

By The Associated Press

Bill Russell starts his career with the Sacramento Kings Friday night, 10 years after his previous coaching job with Seattle and with a light year's difference in attitude.

The Kings will play host to Golden State as the NBA opens its 42nd season with 11 games. The Chicago Bulls are the only team that will not see action.

Russell, who was a player-coach for three years in Boston and a coach for four seasons in Seattle, said he will be more patient with his players than he used to be.

"I recognize that this is a players' league," Russell said. "It's my job to put the players into a position where they can do their best. They appear to be open to my approach. It will take time to see how open they really are."

The Celtics won 11 championships in Russell's 13 years as a player, but Russell says he knows it's difficult to translate skill as a player into coaching skill.

In other games tonight, it will be Cleveland at New Jersey, Indiana at Philadelphia, Washington at Atlanta, New York at Detroit, Milwaukee at Boston, Utah at Dallas, San Antonio at Houston, Los Angeles Clippers at Denver, Seattle at Los Angeles Lakers and Phoenix at Portland.

Russell said that he doesn't believe he left basketball in 1977, when he last coached in Seattle.

"I'm amused by the comments, 'Bill Russell is back in basketball,'" he said. "As far as I'm concerned, I never left. As a broadcaster for many years, I stayed close to the game and watched as the game progressed. What Bill Russell is back in is the coaching arena. I know a lot about winning and I firmly believe that a lot of that can be taught."

Russell, who ultimately will move into the Kings' front office, said he returned to coaching because he found it stimulating.

Russell said he wanted the Kings to emerge from the season with a certain style and personality.

"In the past, if someone asked 'What are the Kings like?' you couldn't answer," Russell said. "Milwaukee plays good defense, the Lakers run and Boston sends out five great starters. I want people to have an idea what the Kings are like. I want hard-nosed defense and to run with anybody."

Russell said his starting lineup will be a combination of the new and old.

Holdovers LaSalle Thompson and Otis Thorpe will start at center and forward, and veteran Reggie Theus will move from point guard to shooting guard. Theus' old spot will be taken by rookie Kenny Smith, and the starting small forward will be Ed Pinckney, acquired from Phoenix.

While Sacramento, 29-53 last season, is rebuilding, expectations are high in Detroit.

Last season, the Pistons had the most successful season in the history of the franchise, tying the team record for wins with a 52-30 record, then taking the Celtics to seven games in the semifinals of the playoffs.

This season the lineup is set, with All-Star Isiah Thomas and Joe Dumars at the guards, Adrian Dantley and Rick Mahorn at forward and Bill Laimbeer at center. Vinnie Johnson, one of the best sixth men in the NBA, will come off the bench.

Governor's mansion site for student's landscaping

By Jan Schwartz
Collegian Reporter

A K-State student has been hired to landscape 225 acres surrounding the governor's mansion in Topeka.

Sue VanLandingham, fifth year senior in landscape architecture, was hired in September by the Cedar Crest Development Committee to design a master plan to develop the land into a wildlife park.

Jim Nighswonger, extension specialist-environmental forestry at K-State, is one of about 30 committee members. Each member represents an organization, such as the Kansas Wildflower Society, Department of Wildlife and Parks, Washburn Walkers, Topeka Beautification Association, and the Topeka Audubon Society.

Nighswonger said the committee's job is to come up with ideas to incorporate into the master plan. He hired VanLandingham to develop the plans evolving from the committee.

"Few people realize the area is open to the public," he said. "Gov. Hayden sees the opportunity and wants to make something of the resources we have available." Twenty acres will be dedicated to the governor's mansion.

The request to develop the land is a reflection of Hayden's interest in two things: to develop the acreage to the optimum, as far as urban wildlife habitat is concerned, and to develop it for the enjoyment of the people of Kansas, Nighswonger said.

Hayden is on the committee and has a background in wildlife and biology.

VanLandingham said she is in charge of the actual implementation of the plan, and the plan will represent a compromise among committee members.

A gazebo overlooking the Kansas River, an interpretive arboretum, and a fishing pond are just a few suggestions from a long list being considered in the master plan.

"Gov. Hayden has his ideas, but the next governor may have a different view," VanLandingham said. "Each person on the committee has their specialty."

Nighswonger said $2,000 dollars has been allocated for the development of the plan, and it will come out of non-game wildlife funds like the Chick-a-dee Check-off on the state income tax form.

The Chick-a-dee Checkoff is a program of the Department of Wildlife and Parks.

Residents hear agencies plan to clean contaminated wells

By The Associated Press

GALENA — Nearly 100 people packed a meeting room here Wednesday night to learn more about the Environmental Protection Agency's plans to provide safe drinking water for more than a thousand rural residents whose private well water is contaminated by heavy metals.

The water contains high quantities of lead and cadmium, which have moved from abandoned lead and zinc mines into a shallow aquifer.

The Galena municipal water supply taps into the largely uncontaminated Roubidoux Aquifer, 900 feet below the surface.

State and federal environmental officials favor a $4.38 million plan to increase the capacity of the Galena municipal water supply by rehabilitating old deep wells or drilling new ones, then building a distribution system to get the water to 418 households with contaminated water.

The federal Superfund program guarantees 90 percent of construction costs, and an equal percentage of first year operating and maintenance costs. But the plan would require homeowners to pay $1,040 per household.

Galena Mayor Tom Allen said he would like a petition signed by at least 50 percent of the affected residents before committing the city to the project.

Residents have until Dec. 4 to send written comments to the EPA's Region 7 Office in Kansas City. A decision on what action to take is scheduled for early 1988, and construction is expected in 1989.

Alice Fuerst, an EPA geologist, said 17 percent of the 123 shallow wells sampled contained heavy metals that exceeded federal health standards for drinking water.

Lead accumulates in bone and other organs, and prolonged exposure can result in brain damage, especially in children, and kidney failure. Cadmium accumulates in liver and kidneys and is thought to cause high blood pressure.

Fifty percent of those wells also exceeded federal standards for odor and taste, primarily because of high iron concentrations of iron, which leaves a reddish stain around sinks, and manganese, which is accompanied by unpleasant taste and black stains. Zinc and selenium, which officials said are not considered health hazards, were also detected in high quantities.

Lending rate cut to aid crisis

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Major U.S. banks cut their prime lending rates another quarter percentage point to 8.75 percent Thursday, as overseas central banks lowered their interest rates to help stem the economic crisis precipitated by last month's stock market crash.

The decline in rates aided stock prices on Wall Street and in London but failed to halt the dollar's plunge in value in foreign exchange.

The first announcements of the prime rate cut came from Citibank and Chase Manhattan Bank — the nation's first- and third-largest banks — shortly after the stock market opened. Other banks quickly followed suit.

About the same time, West German and Swiss central banks said they were cutting key interest rates, a day after Britain made a similar move.

The lowering of the U.S. prime rate — the benchmark used by banks to set interest rates on a variety of corporate and consumer loans — was the second in two weeks. Major banks lowered the rate for the first time this year on Oct. 22, to 9 percent from 9.25 percent.

The prime had been raised five times since August 1986, when it stood at 7.5 percent, because of the falling dollar and fears of higher inflation. At least two big banks had boosted the rate as high as 9.75 percent in early October but promptly reduced it to 9.25 percent in the wake of the Oct. 19 stock market collapse.

Pressure had been mounting for lower rates over the past few weeks.

done on them. The research has been jeopardized by the attacks," said Jack Riley, coordinator of research for the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.
"The cost will run into the hundreds of dollars," Morrill said. "One calf was so badly injured it was put to sleep. Fifteen others were wounded and six so badly hurt they were hospitalized."

"They weren't after food or they would have attacked the calves' stomach and killed them," Riley said. "Instead they chewed off their ears down to the skull and nipped at their legs."

Although the attacks so far have been limited to calves, Riley believes the dogs may eventually stalk humans.

"The real problem with these types of dogs is that once they get used to attacking animals, they can turn on people — adults and children," he said.

"The dogs, one a black Labrador and the other a dark German shepherd, had collars on them. So, they are owned by someone who apparently lets their dogs run free," he said. "The dogs are also in good condition and do not appear to be hungry."

Morrill said a campus police officer said two dogs matching the description of those that attacked the calves reportedly threatened a person on campus recently.

"If stray dogs are found within city limits, they will be taken to the animal shelter, and there is a fee to get them out," said Sgt. Calvin Weese, of the Riley County Police Department.

A Manhattan ordinance classifies the owning of an unleashed, unconfined, vicious dog as a Class B misdemeanor. The owner may be punished by a maximum fine of $1,000 or six months in jail.

Charles Beckom, chief of the KSU Police Department, said, "The best thing to do if these dogs are coming toward you is to remain calm and make no sudden movements. While at the same time, try to put distance between yourself and the dogs."

Beckom urges those who see the dogs to contact campus police immediately.

the label of a bottle of beer, he said. The U.S. Supreme Court decided the representation of the flag for the purpose of advertisement could not be accepted despite the possible infringement of personal liberty.

By the beginning of the 20th century, personal liberty had come to a turning point by taking on right to privacy, Kammen said.

"The right to be left alone is the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men," he said, quoting a former U.S. Supreme Court justice.

Kammen predicted that in the future, right to privacy would be a big issue of personal liberty.

"The issue is by no means exhausted."

noting farm families are still experiencing a large amount of stress. A hidden factor in the crisis is farm machinery hasn't been regularly replaced. This is important, he said, since the machinery will need to be replaced within the next few years.

"Farmers have been consistently cutting costs for the past three years... They are doing whatever they can to make it," Brownback said.

He forecasted the future of Kansas agriculture as one of dramatic change; stating farmers need to be prepared. He predicted an increase in contract farming, which is farming land for an outside owner.

Farmers can expect to see less government money for their products and an increase in government restrictions, due to the federal budget deficit and the stock market, Brownback said.

"Mega farming" is another area that will see an increase, he said. Mega farming is the use of larger, more commercial farms.

In his closing comments, Brownback said the future for Kansas agriculture is bright, but its environment will be different. Farmers need to check into existing alternatives and be prepared to adapt to change.

by Bork.

"Similarly, starting in July, 1985, Attorney General (Edwin) Meese began giving speeches on a variety of constitutional matters," he said. "I think that he performed the single most important service of any individual in terms of the Bicentennial success."

Meese's speeches caused Americans to start discussing the fundamental issues of the Constitution, Kammen said.

Another plus of the Constitution's bicentennial lies in the area of education, he said.

"In the early 1980s, a number of organizations and institutions decided they wanted to make something significant out of the Constitution's bicentennial," Kammen said.

The education division of the National Archives assembled a carefully prepared education kit which is now available to every school system in the country.

"In addition, this is the first anniversary of the Constitution to be celebrated in the age of a hot media — television especially," Kammen said.

A number of fine television series have been made on the Constitution, he said. Video cassettes of these television series are available now to schools.

"That's very important because the Constitution is ultimately a dry document," Kammen said. "Students are most likely to become interested in the Constitution when it is linked to human interest, to real life crises involving real life people."

He said Americans are not knowledgeable about their personal liberties.

After researching polls pertaining to the Constitution, the Supreme Court and the Bill of Rights, Kammen repeatedly found the same results.

In a number of polls, between 2,000 people and 3,500 people were asked what the Bill of Rights was, Kammen said.

"Roughly 11 percent of the people asked can tell you with some accuracy what the Bill of Rights is," he said. "Another 11 percent can tell you in a sort of fuzzy but correct way. The other 78 percent just blow it."

Americans are better able to answer open-ended questions about their personal liberties, Kammen said.

The concept of personal liberty, which has meant a variety of things to different people, has "finally found a home," he said.

During the last generation, the notion of personal liberty and the notion of the constitutional right to privacy have converged, Kammen said.

"If you ask a group of students or a group of concerned lay people what they mean by personal liberty, they are most likely now to define it in terms of their right to privacy," he said.

All quiet on Aggieville front Saturday

Precautions keep violence to minimum

By Alison Neely
Staff Writer
and Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

K-State and the University of Kansas tied in Saturday's football game, but Aggieville came out the real winner as police reported a relatively quiet evening.

"It's quiet. We love it," said City Manager Mike Conduff, who was in Aggieville throughout the night.

Conduff credited efforts by the Riley County Police Department, the Aggieville Merchants Association, and KU and K-State officials for the evening's smooth operation.

Last year, after K-State defeated KU 29-12, an estimated 6,000 people converged on Aggieville and 22 were arrested before the night ended. A car was burned by revelers, who also destroyed several dozen shop windows. Business and property damage was estimated at more than $50,000.

This year was a different ball game. Police closed the main part of Aggieville to vehicular traffic Saturday morning and erected fences to control access. About 300 law enforcement officers from Manhattan, Wichita, Salina, Lawrence and Junction City were on patrol after the game.

Though violence was kept to a minimum, police and Kansas Highway Patrol officers were kept busy. The crowds ranged in size from 3,500 to 4,500 in the four-block core area, said a RCPD spokesman. At any given time, 85-90 officers could be found patrolling the area.

Four arrests were made during the evening. Steven Cathers, junior in pre-law, Morgan T. Olander, Kansas City, Mo., and Kevin Owen of Frankfort were arrested for disorderly conduct. All were released on $500 bond.

Matthew Milonas, Fort Collins, Colo., was arrested for possession of a cereal malt beverage in public and later released on $78 bond.

Citations were issued to 39 individuals during the evening, 18 of which were for open containers of cereal malt and alcoholic beverages. One citation was issued for possession of a beverage container.

Six citations each were given for urinating in public and minor in possession of cereal malt and alcoholic beverages. One citation was issued for furnishing alcohol to minors.

Three citations were given for altered drivers' licenses. One citation was given for possession of a false driver's license and one for misuse of a driver's license.

Littering and disorderly conduct numbered one citation each.

Overall, K-State officials praised

Some partygoers resentful of actions

Saturday night in Aggieville yielded surprises for partygoers.

The abundance of police induced a relatively alcohol-free street scene for the participants. Lines were long for the overcrowded bars, and minors roamed the streets looking for the traditional "riot."

Although police stood on the sidewalks in clusters of six and seven, students seemed unimpressed by their presence.

"It's like curfew for a war."

—Rafael Fantauzzi

"I think it's ridiculous. It's like curfew for a war," said Rafael Fantauzzi, senior in electrical engineering. "That's (the drinking laws) why there was a riot. The riot is not here, it is outside right now."

One disgruntled student said he believed all partying should be moved to another location.

"Why don't they just open City Park?" said Wigui Rosa, sophomore in theater. "Each bar can have a station there. They won't break a tree. Here they can break glass."

While discussing the evening's progression with some students, City Commissioner Richard Hayter received several suggestions as to what they would consider "more fun" than being in Aggieville. At the same time, various press representatives were accused of wanting a riot to occur, thus being assured of an exciting story.

A student from Dodge City Community College found the evening a disappointment.

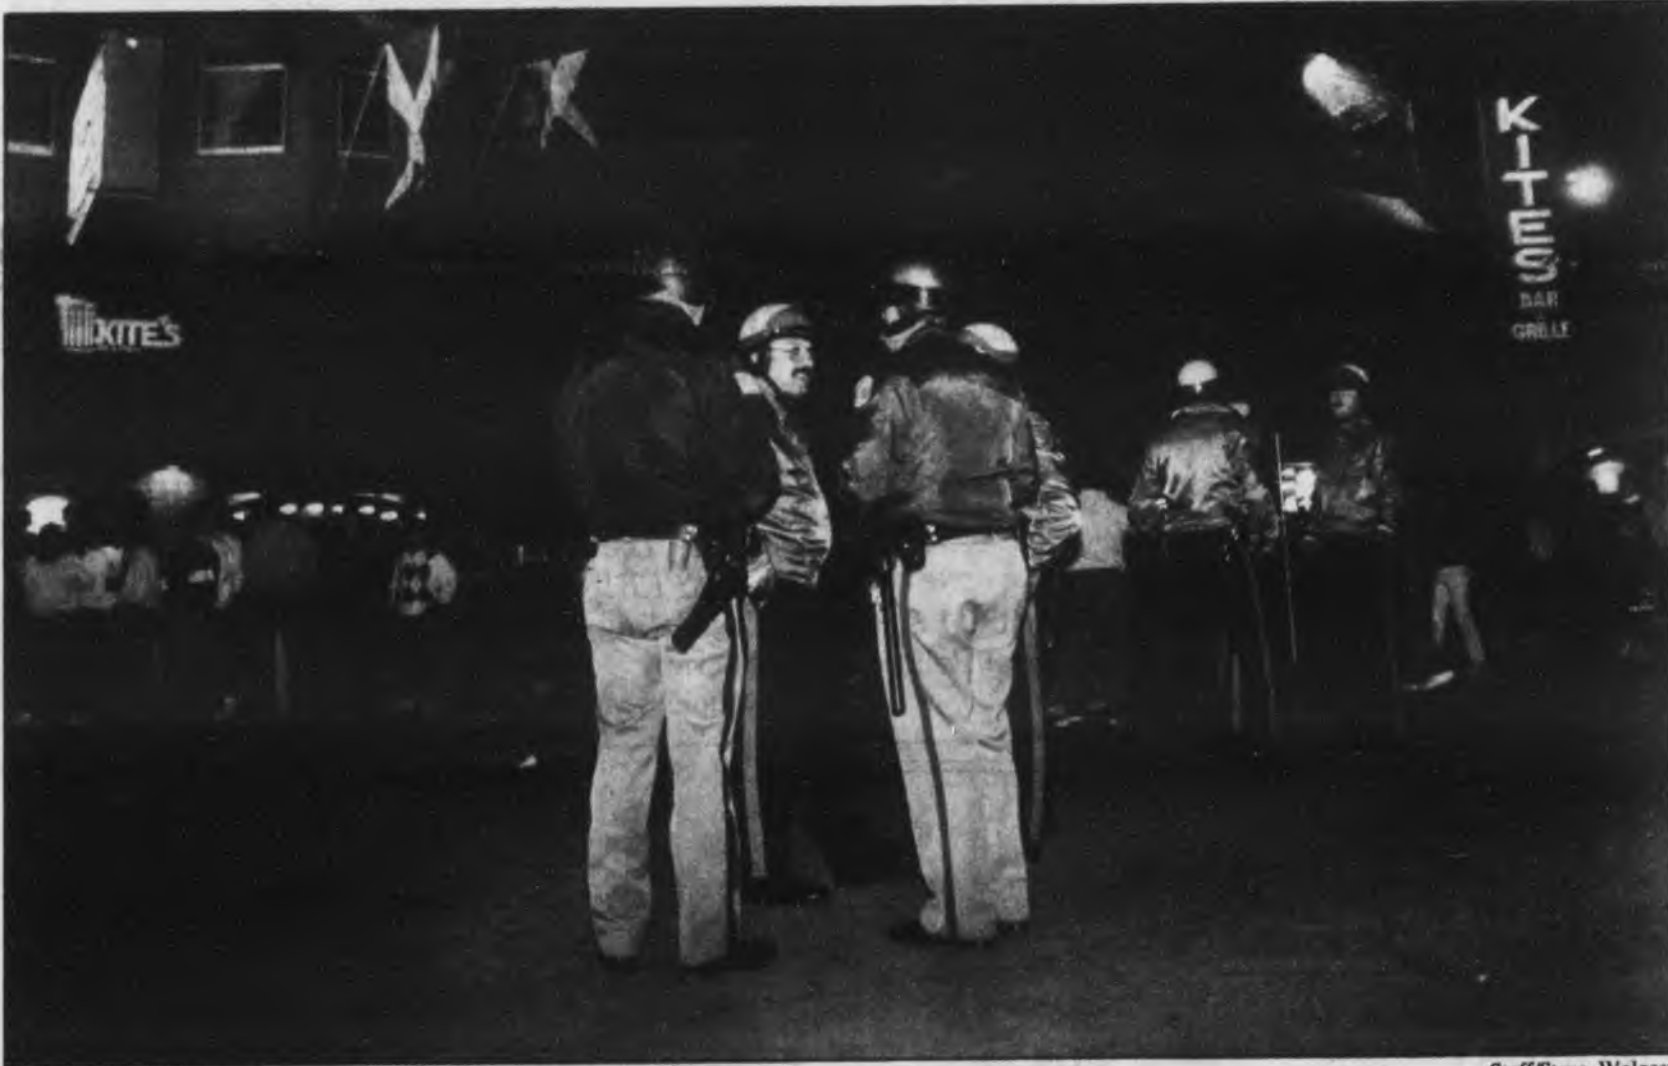

"I came here just for this weekend," said Monica Warner.

"It's kind of boring."

A Kansas Highway Patrol officer said many of his fellow troopers also came to Manhattan for a change of pace.

"It's kind of like working the state fair," said Sgt. R.N. Atkins. "It breaks up the monotony."

Atkins said if he hadn't been standing in Aggieville Saturday night, he would have been working the night shift patrolling the state highways.

Law enforcement officers keep watch over the relatively quiet Aggieville crowd, which ranged in size from 3,500 to 4,500 in the four-block core area Saturday night. Although violence was kept to a minimum, police and Highway Patrol officers were kept busy during the evening.

Wefald: Margin of Excellence vital

University's future 'bleak' without plan

By Susan L'Ecuier
Collegian Reporter

K-State's future will likely be "bleak" unless state legislators adopt the Margin of Excellence plan, President Jon Wefald said Friday.

Wefald, who was speaking in an open forum sponsored by the Faculty Senate, stressed the importance of getting the proposal passed during the 1988 legislative session.

"If we do not get the Margin of Excellence, the future of Kansas State is bleak, bleak, bleak," Wefald said. "There is no doubt about it. If we don't get adequate funding out of the 1988 session, then KU and K-State stand to go into irreversible decline. It's either now or never; there is no plan B."

Wefald, however, is optimistic because of the support indicated by various Kansas institutions.

"I think it's safe to say that never before has the Board of Regents and the presidents — and the chancellor — ever put together the kind of full-court press that we have going on right now on the Margin of Excellence," he said.

Wefald noted the MOE program was gaining important vocal support through newspapers and statewide lobbying groups.

"There have been a plethora of editorials by large newspapers...and small newspapers alike emphatically endorsing the Margin of Excellence," Wefald said. "So the response of the media — especially the newspapers — has been very, very heartwarming from those people realizing how important higher education is to the future of Kansas."

Wefald listed lobbying groups such as the Kansas Farm Bureau, the Kansas Chamber of Commerce and Industries, the Kansas Livestock Association and the Kansas Bankers Association which have expressed their support of the Margin of Excellence program to the governor.

"We have not forgotten the state legislators," Wefald said, indicating the lobbying efforts of alumni and supporters in the Legislature.

Caustic wit may hinder Dole, aide says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Republican leader Bob Dole is launching his campaign for the 1988 presidential nomination as the clear runner-up to Vice President George Bush in the polls, but critics and supporters say he faces lingering questions about personal style and political contradictions.

Today as Dole embarks on his campaign from his hometown of Russell there is general agreement on the impressive steps he has taken in the last 12 months as he has emerged from the pack of Bush's pursuers.

News Analysis

"I think we're ready to go one on one" with Bush, said Bill Lacy, a key campaign aide. "The thing that pleases me most is organizationally, we've made dramatic strides," he said, referring to strong fundraising and paid political operatives in 35 states.

But others say that won't be enough.

"Dole has a marvelous sense of humor, but it's like a two-edged sword," said one campaign aide, speaking on condition of anonymity. This aide said Dole must be careful to use his humor on himself, and not use it for "undermining and deprecating an opponent."

In public he has accomplished that thus far, but in private, Dole is still capable of cutting, acidic remarks. According to one aide, when Dole was musing about how to answer a debate question on which portraits he would hang in the White House, he said he would put up pictures of the men he has defeated in past campaigns.

Aides to other candidates say Dole must decide whether he will run as a conservative or a moderate. "I don't

Student appeals for return of art taken from McCain

By The Collegian Staff

Bill Harvey wants whoever stole his artwork to return it.

Harvey, senior in graphic design, and four other students put their Bachelor of Fine Arts Exhibition on display Oct. 23 in McCain Auditorium. Part of the display was reported missing the following Monday.

Allan Bailey, technical director of McCain Auditorium, said the display had not gotten connected to the alarm system. There was no one available to connect the display by the time the students finished.

The alarm system consists of a wire strung through the back of the pictures and connected to an alarm box and the KSU Police Department, he said.

Bailey said he assumed the large number of people in the building for the performance of "South Pacific" Oct. 23 and Oct. 24 would serve as a deterrent to a possible thief. He also said McCain doesn't always get locked properly.

"If a door gets left open, the whole security system is worthless," Bailey said. "It doesn't always get locked after visiting groups such as K-State Players, music students needing to get to practice rooms, and DJs (going) up to KSDB."

Thefts have not been a problem at McCain before, he said.

"The only one we've had in a long time was three years ago, and it couldn't have been prevented. Someone came in and pried the brackets holding the wire (to the security system) loose and took some things then," Bailey said.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said he was distressed about the incident. He said measures are being taken to prevent future problems.

The incident had been turned over to investigators. No leads exist in the case.

Bomb kills 11 in Ireland

ENNISKILLEN, Northern Ireland — A bomb killed 11 people and injured 55 Sunday at a Remembrance Day ceremony for Britain's war dead in the worst Irish terrorist attack in five years.

The huge explosion transformed the solemn pageant, which recalled the thousands of Ulstermen who died for king and country in two world wars, into a horror scene of bloodshed and destruction.

Friends, relatives, soldiers and bandsmen dug with their bare hands through the rubble of a community center where the bomb was planted in this County Fermanagh town near the Irish border.

The blast blew out one end of the building and the structure collapsed, trapping men, women and children against sidewalk railings.

Police said three married couples were among the six women and five men killed, and that many of the wounded were badly hurt in the 10:45 a.m. blast.

A 14-year-old member of the Boy's Brigade said he was standing near the war memorial ready to lay a wreath when the blast came.

"I dropped the wreath and rushed to where the wall had collapsed. People were screaming and we did all we could to pull them out. At 11 o'clock we should have been remembering the dead, not digging them out," he said.

Terrorists capture 8 Israelis

BEIRUT, Lebanon — The Abu Nidal terrorist group said Sunday that its guerrillas seized a French-registered boat off the Israeli-occupied Gaza Strip and took the eight Israelis on board hostage.

Walid Khaled, a senior lieutenant in the Palestinian group, told a news conference in Moslem west Beirut that the captives — three men, three women and two children — were unharmed.

But he said their "lives will be in danger" if Israel retaliated for the seizure.

The Israelis have carried out 22 air raids against Palestinian camps in Lebanon so far this year, killing at least 105 people and wounding 250.

Khaled said all eight captives are Israelis although some hold dual nationalities. He said five hold Belgian passports and one woman holds a French passport.

Victim's parents sue sorority

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — The parents of a University of Kansas student who died two years ago after falling from the third story of a sorority house in Lawrence have filed a lawsuit alleging the sorority and its officials were responsible for the death.

The suit, filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Kansas City, Kan., names the Gamma Delta chapter of the Alpha Phi Sorority at KU as a co-defendant in the death of Jeanna M. Carkoski.

Carkoski, 19, of Omaha, Neb., died Nov. 9, 1985, the day after she fell from a third-story ledge while cleaning windows on the sorority house.

Also named as defendants in the suit were the Alpha Phi International Fraternity Inc., with headquarters in Evanston, Ill., the house mother and chapter president at the time of the fall.

Candidates meet for debate

DES MOINES, Iowa — Five Democratic presidential candidates took shots at each other at an environmental debate here Sunday, but saved their harshest words for their Republican rivals.

"We've been looking for the Republicans all day, and it just occurred to me where most of them probably are. They're at the courthouse taking depositions for polluting the government with sleaze and corruption for the last seven years," said the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

The debate culminated a busy weekend of campaigning by both Democrats and Republicans in the state, whose February caucuses are a key early test.

In fact, Iowans could barely turn around without sighting a presidential candidate, as 10 of the 12 hopefuls made a round of appearances.

For the Democrats, Sunday's debate was their sixth joint appearance and fourth debate in eight days, and some of them decried pressure on them to accept invitations from influential groups.

Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis said he hoped Democratic National Chairman Paul Kirk would step in to help set guidelines for such events, but Kirk indicated over the weekend he had no such plans.

"I don't think we ought to be in the position of stifling debate," Kirk said. But he added that he was concerned about the demands being placed on candidates.

Carlucci to face defense cuts

WASHINGTON — When Frank Carlucci takes over as secretary of defense, one of the first things he's likely to find on his Pentagon desk is a letter seeking his advice on the best way to cut the defense budget.

It's a question Carlucci will be asked often as the Reagan presidency moves into its final 14 months.

The letter is being written by Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., and Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., who chair the Senate and House Armed Services Committees.

Those two panels are meeting behind closed doors now, trying to work out a compromise on a defense spending bill authorizing the Pentagon budget for the current fiscal year.

The Senate panel is expected to take time out from that chore to hold hearings on Carlucci's nomination, but Nunn and other senators say the 30-year veteran of a variety of government jobs is expected to win Senate confirmation.

Weinberger advises Reagan

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger warned Sunday that the Reagan administration has "to be very careful" in reaching a nuclear arms accord with the Soviet Union and said the United States must maintain its military strength as a deterrent to Soviet attack.

Weinberger, who announced his resignation Thursday, also said he believed that his chosen successor, national security adviser Frank Carlucci, would not use the Strategic Defense Initiative, commonly known as "Star Wars," as a bargaining chip to additional arms accords with the Soviets.

Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev will meet with President Reagan on Dec. 7 in Washington, where they are expected to sign a pact eliminating intermediate-range nuclear missiles.

State official discusses tax credit for those caring for elderly in home

By Paula Selby
Collegian Reporter

Today's senior citizens want to maintain personal independence as long as possible — especially Kansans, who have such a strong "pioneering sense," the secretary of the Kansas Department on Aging said Friday.

Esther Valladolid Wolf, the secretary, discussed current legislative and administrative activities concerning older adults at a seminar held by the K-State Center for Aging. Wolf answered questions on the future of today's elderly for about 20 faculty and students.

K-State and the Department on Aging's combined efforts can help get results for the elderly, Wolf said.

"I wouldn't be here if I didn't think (the University) would play a big role" in the field of aging, Wolf said.

Each department in the University has the strength and expertise to collect necessary data for basic research on aging, she said.

The Department on Aging needs research that redefines the theories of aging and examines how they have changed, Wolf said. It needs research that evaluates the philosophical ways of approaching a problem and the assumptions the field has of treatment for it.

"I think the ethical questions of who should live and who should die will come to battle at the University level," she said.

The department has a budget of $12 million a year, which is the smallest budget in the cabinet, Wolf said, "but we do have an overall mandate to review all the programs."

"Transportation is a big bill that will be coming forth," she said. "(The bill) is for the actual operation of vehicles, not only for the elderly but for the disabled. It is an issue of not only transportation, but moving meals and services back and forth."

The Department on Aging is working on housing legislation also, Wolf said. Housing programs are difficult for the department to develop because Kansas doesn't have a centralized housing authority.

She discussed the possibility of tax credit for support of "the caregiver in the home" because 80 percent of elderly care is given by family members.

Another topic being evaluated is the importance of quality internships within the field of aging, Wolf said. "I think getting people out of the academic setting — what I call a cross-fertilization of the two systems (the University and the field of aging) — starts to enhance everybody's capability," Wolf said.

Wolf was appointed secretary in May. She is also a member of the Presidential Task Force on Women's Health Issues.

Senators advocate prompt replacement for Court nominee

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A key Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee warned Sunday that a delay in the selection of a new Supreme Court nominee might prevent President Reagan from placing a conservative choice on the high court.

Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg, the president's second choice for the high court seat vacated by retired Justice Lewis F. Powell, announced Saturday that he had asked Reagan to withdraw his nomination. Ginsburg said his views on law had been "drowned out in the clamor" over his past marijuana use.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., praised Ginsburg for acting quickly in requesting that his name be withdrawn and said he would like to see the committee adhere to same hearing schedule on a new nominee as the one planned for Ginsburg.

The chairman of the Senate panel, Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., had decided to begin hearings on the Ginsburg nomination the week of Dec. 7.

"I would like to see us start the hearings on the same schedule, in early December," Specter said on ABC-TV's "This Week With David Brinkley."

"I think we can get along with the work, and I think we ought to take the time that is necessary, but I have grave doubts about the talk of putting off the hearings until after the first of the year," Specter said. "I think we ought to take the time we need, and if we find, after we start, that we can't get it done as rapidly as we'd like, we take what time is necessary."

"But starting at a reasonably early date I think is important," he said.

Officials outline strategy for plan

All resources necessary, Slawson says

By Candice Leonard
Government Editor

Calling it "an investment, not an expenditure," Don Slawson, chairman of the Board of Regents, explained the strategy of the "Margin of Excellence" plan Saturday at K-State.

More than 100 alumni, administrators, regents and student leaders from across the state attended a morning briefing on the program prior to a luncheon with Gov. Mike Hayden and area legislators at the Manhattan Country Club.

"We have a very exciting and extremely important plan — the Margin of Excellence," Slawson said. "It's a very challenging year we have ahead of us."

He emphasized using every possible resource to attain support for the three-year funding plan. Slawson commended those students involved with the Higher Education Rescue Operation campaigns on each campus.

"It really is time to provide adequate funding for higher education," Slawson said.

For those wanting to help convince legislators about the necessity of funding, Slawson outlined four points to relay:

■ Kansas has under-funded higher education for the past several years.

"We've documented that fact," Slawson said. "And, I think this is generally acknowledged."

■ This lack of funding is not justified by a poor state economy.

Slawson pointed out other states suffering from the farm crisis have continued a budget commitment to education.

"Iowa increased its funding by 15 percent; Kansas increased its funding by only 5 percent," Slawson said, saying the two states have nearly the same pressures on the economy.

■ Faculty salaries and operating budgets are below a competitive level.

Slawson explained the lower level of funding for faculty salaries makes it difficult to attract and retain faculty with experience. Recent studies show regents institutions are funded at 86.5 percent of the average of their peer institutions. The Margin of Excellence would raise it to 95 percent parity overall and 100 percent parity in faculty salaries, Slawson said.

"When we lose a faculty member with 15 years experience, we have to replace him with someone who only has 5 years experience at the same money," Slawson said, explaining the effect.

■ The Margin of Excellence is the solution for higher education in Kansas.

Stan Koplik, executive director of the regents, spoke about the important impact of the regents' proposal.

"We have the assumption that if you want economic and cultural growth in Kansas, you have to fund higher education or the decline will continue," Koplik said.

Secretary of State Bill Graves, said the Legislature has to balance the competing interests for money in the state, especially with declining revenues and growing needs.

"My perception is that education is in a better situation for funding than the highways," Graves said.

Jon Dell'Antonia, vice president of the Coleman Company, said he attended because his employer believes the Margin of Excellence is important for quality graduates in the future.

"We want our educational institutions to be first-rate, so our company can be first-rate," he said.

Regent Norman Brandeberry said meetings are being held across Kansas to answer questions legislators have about the plan.

Rock music appeals to economists also

A big title on last summer's bestseller lists was "The Closing of the American Mind," a book in which the author, Alan Bloom, discusses the education, values and lifestyles of today's college students. One thing Bloom strongly criticizes is rock music. In Bloom's world, "...rock music has one appeal only, a barbaric appeal, to sexual desire — not love, not eros, but sexual desire undeveloped and untutored." He adds, "Modern day rationalists, such as economists, are indifferent to it and what it represents."

Being an economist and a serious listener of rock, I have to disagree with Bloom's remarks. If "sexual desire undeveloped and untutored" is what rock is all about, I'm certainly not indifferent to that. More to the point, I think there are many redeeming qualities to be found in the work of some rock artists. A good example which confirms my point is the new Sting album, "...Nothing Like the Sun."

The development of Sting's music — from his early days with the Police to his first solo project "The Dream of the Blue Turtles" to this latest solo effort "...Nothing Like the Sun" — is breathtaking. "An almost mathematical progression" was the phrase I once heard used to describe the progression of the Beatles' music as it moved from "Help" to Avoid selecting 'mindless trash'

"Rubber Soul" to "Revolver" to "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band." This accurate description for those Beatle albums came back to me when I heard the new Sting album.

If you've ever heard an AC/DC album, you know what bad contemporary music is: untalented musicians playing lousy music full of meaningless lyrics. For my money, good contemporary music doesn't end with the music alone but uses sounds to support lyrics that have something to say about life and the world we live in. Sting has always had something to say, both with the Police and on "The Dream of the Blue Turtles," but his latest lyrics are more sophisticated than ever.

"The Dream of the Blue Turtles," for example, has a song about the Cold War called "Russians," which runs in part: how can I save my little boy from Oppenheimer's deadly toy? there is no monopoly of common sense on either side of the political fence! we share the same biology! regardless of ideology! believe me when I say to you! I hope the Russians love their children too. A good statement it is, but fairly direct and not really transferable to a variety of situations.

Collegian Columnist

"...Nothing Like the Sun" does have a couple of songs like this, including "They Dance Alone" — a song about the women in Chile who dance with pictures of relatives who have been "disappeared" by the Pinochet regime — and "Rock Steady," a hip version of the Noah's Ark story that disguises a great slam on television evangelists.

But the really sophisticated songs are those whose lyrics are more subtle and keep offering new thoughts with repeated listenings.

Peter Gabriel is a master at this. Sting seems to be developing this talent, and it shows in the cuts "History Will Teach Us Nothing" and "Fragile" on the new album: perhaps this final act was meant to clinch a lifetime's argument that nothing comes from violence! and nothing ever could for all those born beneath an angry star! lest we forget how fragile we are.

"...Nothing Like the Sun" is a fantastic collection of ideas about love, life and the problems of the world, and it combines these thoughts with appropriate styles of music that strengthen the expression of those ideas. That is what good contemporary rock should do. In making sweeping generalizations to paint a picture of modern society, Alan Bloom fails to regard these things in "The Closing of the American Mind."

But Bloom is right in recognizing that students today believe it is impossible to make value judgements. Thus, when I call AC/DC's music bad, someone will say I have no right to criticize it because even though I don't like it, someone else might. When I encounter two gray squares hanging in a modern art museum and dare to ask, "What fool calls this art?" my friends stare at me in horror and complain, "Maybe it's not art for you, but it could be for someone else, so don't criticize it."

Wrong. AC/DC is bad music. Two gray squares on the wall are not art. The rock music I listened to in high school — Foreigner, Journey, REO Speedwagon — is mindless trash. Other contemporary artists — like Paul Simon, Peter Gabriel, Kate Bush or Sting — produce music that has redeeming qualities. You don't have to like it, but you can't fail to recognize it has more to offer the world than does Madonna's mindless, repetitive pop trash.

Of course, this is supposed to be a free society. People should have the right to listen to any music they want to, and no one person or organization is qualified to make a value judgement which takes away that right — a truism which seems to be lost on many Christians. But while we shouldn't have the right of censorship, we do have the duty to improve the quality of art and culture in our society, in part by thinking about what music we listen to, and by persuading others to voluntarily refrain from supporting the AC/DCs and Madonnas of the world.

'Aggietraz' situation forced by prior actions

Face it: They did what they had to do.

Saturday evening in Aggieville in no way resembled the Aggieville of the past two K-State-University of Kansas post game celebrations. Saturday night in Aggieville resembled more the name emblazoned on T-shirts being sold during the evening.

Aggieville had been transformed into "Aggietraz" — a relation to the now defunct Alcatraz.

The entrances to the area were blocked off by heavily lighted, neon orange fences; police monitored those entering the area; and for every patron it seemed there was at least one law enforcement agent.

Sounds like lots of fun.

To add to the already crowded evening, enter the media with their satellite truck, briefing room, numerous video cameras and obnoxious flashes. It seemed all eyes were turned to Aggieville in the anticipation a "riot" would break out.

But with enough law enforcement and a "maximum security area," it's no wonder students were discouraged from being their normally boisterous selves.

If the Aggieville crowd seemed mellow Saturday night, chalk that up to individuals in the past who gave Manhattan, K-State and area merchants the right to curtail partying in the streets of Aggieville.

Manhattan merchants could not lose $100,000 in damages each time K-State hosted the K-State-KU game.

And K-State could not damage its recruiting reputation with the marring caused by a bi-annual "riot."

So as a result, "Aggietraz" was erected, law enforcement agents were imported from around the state and all was quiet on the Aggieville front.

Unfortunately, even after the crowd's model behavior Saturday night, "Aggietraz" is to be erected the next time K-State and KU face each other on the gridiron.

Because of the previous incidents, it is naive to believe Aggieville will ever be the free area it once was when KU's in town. But in time, the merchants, city and K-State may see that students can handle the responsibility of a "Big Brother"-less area.

Poetic justice rendered Saturday for seemingly conservative judge

Poetic justice. The biggest rivalry in the state, the KU-K-State game, winds up a tie. One guy sitting behind me at the game described it as "three hours of masturbation." Maybe we should have called off the game and just gone to Aggieville instead. It was peaceful there this year, but I couldn't help comparing it to the East German side of the Berlin Wall with all the riot troops there. Well, peace comes at a price.

At almost the exact time the Wildcats scored their first touchdown, another event was happening in Washington, D.C., with far greater implications but with a similar theme. United States Supreme Court nominee Douglas Ginsburg, the "law and order" justice, withdrew himself from consideration for the high court position because of the flap about his seemingly lax attitude toward marijuana use. A poetic ending indeed.

Don't get me wrong. I don't think Ginsburg is any less qualified because of his marijuana use. In fact, I could care less if he dropped LSD and wandered around Washington naked catching butterflies. Smoking weed a few times isn't going to make someone a "bad" person. But who knows, maybe Ginsburg would have had some paranoid flashback and declared the Bill of Rights a communist plot. Of course, we don't have to worry about that now.

But, pot smoking should not be used as a reason to refrain from hiring someone for a job. This is a rare time I am in agreement with Attorney General Edwin Meese III, who said government leaders would have a hard time finding anyone to fill government jobs who hadn't smoked marijuana at least once. It seems everyone did drugs in the 1960s, a time President Reagan refers to as "that terrible age of permissiveness," which means people

Commentary

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

did what they wanted to do. I guess Reagan has reversed this trend toward "permissiveness" and replaced it with Reaganomics.

The president did try to save the Ginsburg nomination by saying the judge had only "committed mistakes of youth" and that he should be forgiven. However, there is a question of what the word "young" means to Reagan. Ginsburg was in his 30s and a law professor at Harvard when he last admitted to smoking marijuana. A 30-year-old may seem young to an old man like Reagan, but you can hardly consider Ginsburg's drug use a juvenile offense.

Doesn't this seem like a lot of fuss over a little weed that grows wild all over the world? After all, do we have the right to outlaw one of God's creations? One interesting story I ran into was the possibility that Jesus smoked hashish, which is a concentrated form of marijuana. It is known that hashish smoking was prevalent in the Middle East at that time. While no one can prove Jesus actually used the drug, he would have had to know about its existence. Why is there no mention of this drug in the Bible? In fact, it was the coming of Islam — the religious faith of the Muslims — that brought a decrease of drug use in the Middle East.

But now Reagan has a familiar problem confronting him: who should he pick next to run the gauntlet to the U.S. Supreme Court? After the two recent failures, people might be hesitant to accept the nomination, fearing the public may find out they smoked burlap in their grandfather's barn when they were 10 or some other silly thing like that. I sure as hell wouldn't accept.

The whole issue of character has become overwhelming. Some may think this situation is silly (which it is), but there is a reason for it: politics in this country has been brought down to the point where it is taboo for a politician to address any issue of importance for fear of being ignored or misunderstood. The political process has been cheapened to the point where how good you look on television is more important than what you have to say. Image is more important than issues in a society where ignorance is gaining on intelligence.

And when you get down to pure image campaigning such as this, any character defect will prove disastrous. Gary Hart and Joe Biden might still be in the race for president if people had listened to the issues they supported. However, this is not just the people's fault. The public rarely got to hear the issues of these two candidates anyway.

Can Reagan find a Supreme Court nominee who has never smoked marijuana, never fired a special prosecutor, never taken vacations in Bimini with fashion models, never plagiarized John F. Kennedy — and who still has a conservative philosophy just to the right of Attila the Hun? Sorry I can't wish you luck, Reagan, but I would like to see the Constitution stay around a little longer. After all, I kind of like the idea of permissiveness. To me, it sounds like freedom.

Reporter receives awards for story about ticket scam

By Deron Johnson
Editor

ATLANTA — Judy Lundstrom, senior in journalism and mass communications and Special Projects Editor of the Collegian, was one of more than 30 speakers at the Investigative Reporters and Editors conference Saturday.

In a session titled "These Hall-lowed Halls," Lundstrom was one of three student panelists who explained how they researched and wrote their prize-winning investigative stories. The other students were from Louisiana State University and the University of Houston.

The story about which Lundstrom was asked to speak involved an international consumer scam in which unsuspecting travelers purchased invalid frequent-flyer airline tickets from a travel agency in San Diego. Among the victims caught up in the elaborate scheme were several K-State students.

The copyrighted story first appeared in the Jan. 15 Collegian, and the newspaper carried updates of legal proceedings involving the agency throughout the spring semester. Several other publications, including the Wall Street Journal, USA Today and The Dallas Morning News, eventually ran stories on the scam. As a result of Lundstrom's story, the San Diego agency was eventually shut down.

Lundstrom told students at the session that patience as well as persistence are vital when doing investigative reports. In addition, she encouraged students to document dates and times while conducting the investigation.

"You never know when you'll have to appear in court," she said. "If you do, complete dates and times come in handy."

Lundstrom did have to testify in the ticket scam case because she bought an invalid ticket from the agency while it was under a court-ordered injunction to sell no more frequent-flyer tickets. The case was brought to U.S. District Court by Trans World Airlines against the travel agency, and the airline was awarded more than $120,000 in damages.

The IRE convention, which is conducted twice annually, is designed to give collegiate journalists the opportunity to hear professional investigative reporters from across the country. More than a dozen Pulitzer Prize winning journalists served as panelists at the conference, including reporters from the Philadelphia Inquirer, The New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, the Washington Post and NBC News.

In addition to being asked to speak at the IRE conference, Lundstrom has received other awards for her story. She won a $1,000 scholarship from the Roy W. Howard Foundation for public affairs reporting, and she was recently named a semi-finalist in the Rolling Stone/Smith Corona College Journalist Competition.

Alpha Phi Alpha wins 'step' contest

By The Collegian Staff

About 450 people watched the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity "step" on six other greek organizations to win the all-greek step show competition, Thunder Marchdown '87, Saturday night at the Houston Street Ballroom.

For its efforts, Alpha Phi Alpha from the University of Missouri at Kansas City was awarded a $300 cash prize and trophy, said Marque Mahan, vice president of Phi Beta Sigma of K-State. Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, K-State and Alpha Phi Alpha, Fort Riley, both received second-place trophies. Phi Beta Sigma from

The Wichita State University was awarded a plaque for third place. The Sigma Doves and the Football Fraternity performed exhibition shows.

Mahan defined "stepping" as a cross between a dance competition and a drill team competition with a little cheerleading mixed in.

"Music is used during the entrance and exit — other than that, you're making your own music, rhyming verses, using your hands and feet," said Vincent Key, treasurer of Phi Beta Sigma. "Some use canes, some use other props. Each group has its own personality."

Each team was judged on appearance, precision, originality, crowd response and courtesy to the audience, Mahan said. Points were deducted for exceeding the 10-minute time limit, displaying a lack of sportsmanship and using excessive vulgarity.

Four of the six judges represented groups affiliated with greek organizations not taking part in the competition, he said. The other two judges were non-greek.

Norman Ford, president of Phi Beta Sigma, said half the money from the proceeds would be donated to the United Negro College Fund and the other half would be used for service projects in Manhattan sponsored by Phi Beta Sigma.

About $1,500 was grossed from the competition, Mahan said.

Invitations to compete in the step show were sent to black organizations in Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Oklahoma, he said. The competition was open to any greek organizations wanting to enter.

Mahan said the competition, sponsored by Phi Beta Sigma Inc. of K-State and Budweiser, was also held last year and he would like to see it become an annual event.

One dies after 2 trains collide in Wyoming

By The Associated Press

KEMMERER, Wyo. — Two Union Pacific freight trains collided head-on Sunday, destroying the lead engines on both trains and killing a conductor, officials said. Six crew members were injured, some when they jumped before the crash.

One of the trains apparently passed a signal on the main line, said Union Pacific spokesman Joe Thibodeau, but he added that the accident was still under investigation. There was no immediate indication how fast the trains were moving.

The collision around 6:15 a.m., about 10 miles west of Kemmerer, involved a westbound train headed from Chicago to Seattle and an eastbound train going from Seattle to Chicago. He said it was the eastbound train that may have passed the signal.

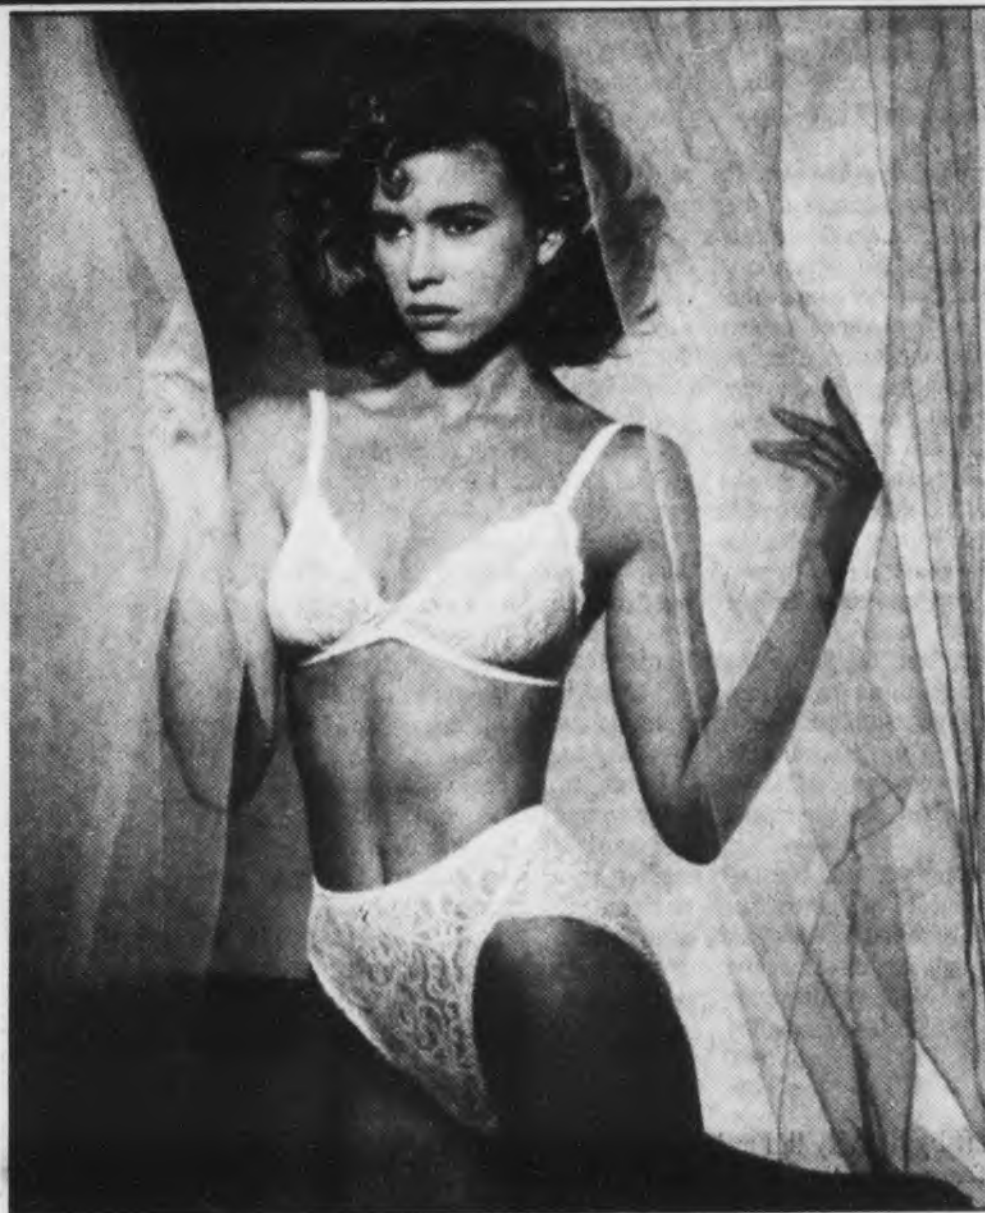

Flatbed cars carrying truck trailers and an engine of the eastbound train and two engines of the westbound train derailed in the accident, said John Bromley, a Union Pacific spokesman in Omaha, Neb.

The cars were the eighth and ninth cars back from the engines, he said, and derailed "as a result of jackknife force." The two lead engines on each train were destroyed, he said.

None of the truck trailers came off the flatbed cars, Bromley said, but some diesel fuel spilled from the trains' engines.

Bromley said N.E. Hanson of Pocatello, Idaho, the conductor of the westbound train, was killed in the accident.

THE BATTLE POTEMKIN

Sergei Eisenstein was assigned by the Soviet government to re-create on film the revolution of 1905: what emerged was the story of but one incident of that revolution. The crew of the Battleship Potemkin revolted due to the inhumane conditions that pervaded the ship. Upon landing, the crew found the people of Odessa sympathetic to their cause and turned out on the steps of the waterfront to greet them where the cossacks stormed the crowd to repress any outbursts. "The Odessa Steps" sequence is perhaps the most widely discussed film sequence in film history. Consistently voted one of the 10 greatest films of all time by the International Critics Poll. 'Battle of plains' provides joyless 17-17 stalemate

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

No one felt worse about K-State's 17-17 tie Saturday with the University of Kansas than Wildcat kicker Mark Porter.

Porter, who made only one of four field goal attempts, had a 28-yard try blocked by Kansas' strong safety Marvin Mattox in the game's final play.

"I ended up costing us the game," Porter said. "I think the rest of the team should feel real good because they fought hard and did a great job."

"I'm only out there once in awhile and I have to make the most of my opportunities for the team. They're out there busting their ass every down and I go out there and miss an easy field goal and it ends up costing us...the game," he added.

Porter shouldn't take the loss personally, though. It may have been a fitting end to a game played by two teams which many consider among the worst in the nation.

The Wildcats and the Jayhawks combined for eight turnovers including five during a four-minute span in the first quarter. The tie seemed to have left both teams and the 37,600 fans in KSU Stadium with an empty feeling.

"I'm not happy with the tie. I'm happy with the team effort, but not the tie," said 'Cat tailback Tony Jordan, who led both squads in rushing with 147 yards on 32 carries.

"I don't think there's any satisfaction from a tie," K-State tight end Kent Dean said. "It's sad that both teams had to work so hard...and go home without a victory."

"This 17-17 tie is better than a loss, but if we would have stopped our mistakes we could have pulled this out," added Jayhawk running back Arnold Snell, who had a career-high 32 carries and picked up 124 yards.

About the only people who talked about the bright spots were K-State Coach Stan Parrish and Kansas Coach Bob Valesente. Those two may have grown accustomed to making the best of a bad situation.

"I feel really great about a lot of things we did very, very well," Valesente said. "Our youth and inexperience stands out at times, (but) you don't see it as much anymore."

"Are you sure we didn't win by three?" asked Parrish after the game, who saw K-State's losing streak stop at 13. "I'm sure I'll remember this one forever."

On their first possession, the 'Cats drove 83 yards only to have Jordan fumble in the end zone. Three turnovers later, defensive back Erick Harper picked off an errant pass from KU freshman quarterback Kevin Verdugo and returned it 64 yards to give K-State a 7-0 lead.

Harper struck again with 9:48 left in the second period when he blocked a 53-yard field goal attempt by Kansas, but Porter missed from 43 yards out on K-State's subsequent possession.

Verdugo took over and engineered two scoring drives to give Kansas a 10-7 halftime lead. The freshman from Pittsburg said he wasn't bothered by the attention given to the annual rivalry.

"I just blocked it out of my mind and concentrated on going out and doing what had to be done," he said.

Verdugo's 9-of-16 passing effort for 165 yards also temporarily ended the musical chair quarterback situation in Lawrence. Verdugo and sophomore Kelly Donohoe have traded starting assignments twice this season.

"I wasn't doing the job. I don't blame Coach (Valesente) for pulling me," Verdugo said. "But while I was out for those couple of games, I learned a lot from watching."

Verdugo's favorite target was flanker Willie Vaughn, who led both teams in receptions with 73 yards on three catches, but tight end John Baker was an unexpected surprise. The 6-foot-4, 230-pound sophomore caught two passes on Kansas' final scoring drive for 22 and 25 yards.

"I wasn't expecting to have this kind of game, but with Willie seeing a lot of double coverage I just happened to be open for the big plays," Baker said.

K-State took a 14-10 lead early in the final period when quarterback Gary Swim hit Dean with a 21-yard scoring toss. Porter extended the Wildcats' lead by three with 8:49 left in the game by nailing a 34-yard field goal.

Kansas then drove 71 yards in 10 plays, and knotted the score at 17-17 on Mike Rogers' 3-yard run. This set up the exciting finish which Parrish said was "the most fun I've had since I've been here."

K-State drove to Kansas' 23-yard line only to have a pass intended for Dan Hughes intercepted by Jayhawk free safety Clint Normore in the end zone. With possession and only 1:16 remaining, KU did the unexpected and fumbled. That fumble was recovered by 'Cat defensive lineman Tim MacDonald.

"I thought we won (the game) on a miracle when we got the ball there on that last exchange," Parrish said. "I couldn't believe they fumbled it."

Tack on a 15-yard unsportsmanlike conduct penalty on Kansas for protesting the call, and K-State had the ball on the Jayhawks' 15 with 36 seconds left.

Staff/Andy Nelson

K-State kicker Mark Porter made one of four field goal attempts during Saturday's 17-17 tie with the University of Kansas.

"It was a bad call," Snell said. "We had the ball...and one of K-State's players took it away (in the pileup)."

Two runs up the middle set up Porter's game-winning attempt, but Mattox, a 6-4 senior, spoiled the Wildcat victory party.

"I got off the line and I got up in the air to block the field goal," he said. "(Left tackle) Mark Knocz and (left end) Eldridge Avery took out the center's legs and I went right over them."

Someone once said a tie is comparable to kissing your sister, but there is one positive note from this edition of the annual Sunflower State battle. It saved the University $6,000 in goal posts and quieted any notions of another riot in Aggieville.

Wildcat defense tightens grip, allows half of average yardage

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

In a game that had more ups and downs than a roller coaster, K-State's defensive unit brought its level of play up a notch.

The defense, which usually allows opposing runners to run rampant, tightened down and allowed the University of Kansas less than half of the rushing yardage the 'Cats usually surrender.

K-State's defense was giving up 310 rushing yards per game going into the intrastate rivalry, but Saturday allowed Jayhawk runners only 131 yards on 47 carries. The 'Cats also gave up 165 yards through the air, five yards less than K-State's season average.

Led by seniors Matt Wallerstedt and Grady Newton and sophomore Erick Harper, the Wildcats made several big defensive plays early in the contest that the offense was not able to capitalize on.

Harper's 64-yard touchdown run on an interception was one of only two times the 'Cats found the end zone.

Although KU was able to put 10 points on the board in the first half, K-State's defense was successful in forcing the Jayhawks to punt or turn the ball over on each of its first five possessions.

"We did a little more blitzing than we have in the past," said Wildcat head coach Stan Parrish. "We just tried to mix it up. It was the best game our defense has played by far."

Trailing 10-7 at halftime, the 'Cat defense was confident it could keep the 'Hawks from scoring.

"When we came out in the second half, we were pretty confident that they couldn't move the ball on us. Maybe a little overconfident," 'Cat defensive tackle Tim MacDonald said. "Both teams made costly turnovers, but I think the key thing was when they tied it up, we really had to suck it up."

"We came close a bunch of times, we just didn't put it in (the end zone) the first quarter when we needed to," said Wallerstedt, a linebacker who had seven tackles.

"There were a couple times in the game that I felt if we could just put it in the end zone or kick the field goal, (the Jayhawks) were really sunk because they were just hanging on by a thread," he added.

K-State's defense looked for the offense to help apply some pressure to the 'Hawks in the way of points. But the offense remained virtually silent until the fourth period when the 'Cats scored a touchdown and a field goal.

No. 1 Sooners lose two starters in OSU showdown

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The nation's No. 1 team will finish the season without its top two offensive players.

Oklahoma lost quarterback Jamele Holieway and fullback Lydell Carr during a 29-10 victory Saturday over No. 12 Oklahoma State. Both players suffered knee injuries; Carr going down in the first quarter and Holieway leaving in the fourth quarter.

"Obviously, it affects our football team when you lose two great players," said Sooners Coach Barry Switzer. "We have to pull together as a team. We've got some young, inexperienced talented players that I believe in, and they believe in themselves."

In other Big Eight games, No. 2 Nebraska stopped Iowa State, 42-3 and Colorado beat Missouri, 27-10.

Holieway was Oklahoma's leading rusher with 860 yards. Carr was second with 673 yards. Redshirt freshman Charles Thompson, who has scored nine touchdowns, will take over for Holieway and Rotnei Anderson, who gained 191 yards Saturday, will fill in for Carr.

"We lost two great players," Switzer said. "We have some young players who will have to take up the slack."

Holieway scored on a 5-yard run on Oklahoma's first possession against the Cowboys in Norman, and Oklahoma led 10-3 at halftime. The Sooners, unbeaten in nine games and 5-0 in the conference, sealed the victory over Oklahoma State, 7-2 and 3-2, in the fourth quarter when Troy Johnson intercepted a pass and returned it 10 yards for a score and Ricky Dixon returned another intercepted pass 95 yards for a touchdown.

It was the 146th career victory for Switzer, surpassing Bud Wilkinson as the winningest coach at Oklahoma and in the Big Eight.

Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne also got his 146th career win, but he was not happy with it.

"I didn't think we played our best football game, which is what we wanted to see," he said after the victory at Lincoln. "I would like to see our people execute a little better. At times we played sloppy football."

Keith Jones, who gained 240 yards, had the fifth-best rushing day in Nebraska history despite sitting out the fourth quarter. He scored twice as the Huskers, 9-0 and 5-0, rang up a 28-0 lead by halftime.

"Nebraska has a little better team speed than I remember when I was here," Iowa State Coach Jim Walden said. "I'm proud of our team, but we were just undermanned. We played a much superior team today, but I'm proud of our effort."

The Cyclones fell to 2-7 and 1-4. Nebraska is idle next week before meeting Oklahoma Nov. 21. The Sooners play Missouri next week. Missouri was flat at Colorado in a game it probably had to win to finish with a winning record.

"Not too much good came out of this," said Coach Woody Widenhofer, now 4-5 and 2-3 with games remaining with Oklahoma and Kansas. "I thought this was an important football game. Obviously it wasn't. We were going through the motions in the first half. If it is not important for you to play good, you are going to get beat. It should have been important."

J.J. Flannigan scored on a 53-yard run, Dave DeLine hit a 31-yard field goal and Erich Kissiek converted a Tigers fumble into a 3-yard touchdown run as Colorado put Missouri into a 17-0 hole in the first half.

"It took a lot out of us," Widenhofer said.

The victory kept Colorado's hopes for a bowl bid alive. The Buffaloes, 6-3 and 3-2, have games left with K-State and Nebraska.

Rugby teams gears up for Kansas

Senior lost to injury could hurt

By Jeff Rapp
Sports Editor

One week before its biggest game of the year, the K-State rugby squad received some good news and some bad news.

The good news came Saturday in the form of a 13-3 victory over the Johnson County Rugby Football Club. The 'Cats bounced back from a 3-0 first half deficit to dominate the rest of the match, but in the process lost the services of senior wing forward standout Dave Todd to a serious ankle injury.

Todd's season-ending injury was the bad news as K-State heads into its season finale next Saturday against the University of Kansas in Manhattan at Gorman Park.

The match, as usual, will decide who will be the Heart of America Union representative at the Western Collegiate Territorial Championships to be held in April.

As far as head coach Danny Blea could tell, though, Todd's injury was the only bad thing about Saturday's win.

"Everything was there. We didn't miss much at all," he said.

"(Todd's) loss hurts us a lot, but it just means people are going to have to carry more than their load next weekend and play a little bit better."

James Bell, a soldier from Fort Riley who is a three-year rugby club veteran, took Todd's place and did an admirable job, Blea said. But that doesn't solve the personnel problem, because Bell is not qualified to play in the collegiate merit table match against Kansas next Saturday. Blea said he's not sure who will be called on to fill the gap.

"I'll have to talk to some of the other selectors before that decision is made, but the bottom line is we'll have to find somebody to replace him. I don't know if we'll find anybody of his caliber," Blea said.

As somewhat of a consolation, K-State looked fine-tuned against a solid Johnson County squad. After what Blea described as a slow start, K-State tied the score at 3-3 on a penalty kick by senior Gregg Barnes.

That ended the first half scoring and the 'Cats provided all the offense in the second stanza. With more determination and defensive pressure, K-State scored on tries by senior Steve Duncan and junior Kevin Wagner, while Barnes converted on one-of-two extra kicks.

In the B-side match, K-State defeated Johnson County 18-4, with two scores coming from Shawn Hughes and one apiece coming from Dave Ferris and Bob Crow.

Soccer squad defeated

By The Collegian Staff

Jayhawk supporters may not have had much to cheer about Saturday in the annual K-State-Kansas football game. But Sunday was a different day for the University of Kansas.

The K-State men's soccer club lost 2-1 to Kansas in a 2 p.m. match in Lawrence. Kansas scored in the first 10 minutes of the first period to take a 1-0 lead. A few minutes later, K-State senior Dave Weitz scored K-State's only goal and evened the score at 1-1. Kansas scored the decisive goal right before the referee's whistle blew to signal the end of the first half and went on to win 2-1.

"If we had just held out a little longer, it would have been a different game," K-State graduate student Harold Rathburn said.

Saturday, in Manhattan, the men's team beat the University of Nebraska, 1-0, by a forfeit when Nebraska didn't show up for the match. The women's squad defeated Nebraska 2-1.

Chiefs' offense sputters; Anderson lifts Pittsburgh

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Gary Anderson, 90 seconds after missing a 41-yard field goal, drilled a 45-yarder Sunday to give Pittsburgh a 17-16 NFL victory over Kansas City and hand the Chiefs a club record-tying seventh consecutive loss.

It also was the second straight game against Pittsburgh in which the Chiefs' defense and special teams scored every point.

Nick Lowery's third field goal carried 38 yards with 10:36 to play and gave the Chiefs, 1-7, a 16-14 lead.

After Anderson was wide right from 41 yards out, the Steelers, 4-4, got the ball back when Gerald Williams recovered Christian Okoye's fumble on the Kansas City 27. Anderson then kicked his winning three-pointer with 4:02 to play.

It was a fumble by Okoye, a 250-pound rookie running back, that led to Chicago's fourth-quarter touchdown in a 31-28 victory over the Chiefs last week.

The Chiefs, making their first home appearance since Sept. 13, grabbed a 7-0 lead 1:15 into the game when linebacker Jack Del Rio forced quarterback Mark Malone into a fumble. Tackle Bill Maas, who went to the Pro Bowl last year as a nose-guard, fell on the ball on the 6-yard line, got up and lumbered into the end zone.

The lead held until 3:59 remained in the second half and Rodney Carter, capping a 90-yard drive, caught a 4-yard toss from Malone for the first of his two touchdown receptions.

Lowery sent the Chiefs into halftime with a 10-7 lead by kicking a 41-yarder midway through the second quarter. Carter's 26-yard touchdown catch gave the Steelers a 14-10 lead with 9:55 left in the third period. Lowery's 27-yarder, following a Kansas City interception, trimmed Pittsburgh's lead to 14-13 early in the fourth period.

The Chiefs also lost seven straight in 1985.

Kansas City's defense and special teams also scored every point last December in a playoff-clinching 24-19 victory at Pittsburgh.

Kenney, a week after throwing four touchdown passes against Chicago, hurt himself with two critical interceptions. Thomas Everett stole an underthrown Kenney pass on the Pittsburgh 9-yard line and Dwayne Woodruff intercepted another on the Pittsburgh 3.

The Chiefs had driven from their own 21 to the Steeler 22 in the second quarter when Everett victimized Kenney for his first NFL interception, giving Pittsburgh the ball on its own 10.

John Stallworth, working against backup cornerback J.C. Pearson, caught consecutive passes for 13 yards each in the ensuing 13-play drive. On second-and-20 from the Chiefs' 31, safety Deron Cherry made a diving interception of Malone's pass at the goal line. But pass interference on cornerback Albert Lewis wiped out the play and kept the Steelers' drive alive for Carter's first touchdown catch.

Carter, a second-year running back from Purdue, was wide open on his second catch, making the reception without a defender within 10 yards of him as the Steelers took a 14-10 lead 5:05 into the second half.

Defense

Facing a third down and 10 situation, KU quarterback Kevin Verdugo fumbled the snap and MacDonald recovered for the 'Cats.

"It was a big play because it gave us a chance to win," MacDonald said. "Everybody was grabbing for it, but I just hung on to it with everything I had. Everybody realized that was the game right there."

Porter came in to attempt a 28-yard field goal to put the 'Cats on top, but his effort was blocked as time ran out and the score remained tied.

"I wanted to win," Newton said. "It wasn't fun, but it gives us a little hope. Maybe next time we can come back and win."

"It's a building block any time you can tie a game when you've been losing and not playing well," Harper added.

"I'm very proud of the effort our kids expended out there today," Parrish said. "We made some mistakes, but we played awfully hard and we fought and scrapped until we recovered the fumble there at the end."

Juco transfer idea catches on in Big 8

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

Big Eight Conference basketball fans know the names Manning, Chievous, Richmond and Grayer.

University of Kansas' Danny Manning, the conference's brightest star, heads everyone's preseason All-America squad and is expected to lead the Jayhawks to national prominence.

Derrick Chievous, Missouri's walking advertisement for Band-Aid adhesive strips, is heralded as the Big Eight's most explosive offensive threat.

K-State's Mitch Richmond, as he showed against Georgia last season in the NCAA tourney, may be the next Big Eight performer ready to gain national stardom.

Finally, Iowa State's Jeff Grayer, injured much of last season, appears ready to regain the form that made him the conference's top sophomore two seasons ago.

But very likely, when all is said and done and a conference champion has been determined, those four superstars likely will have been just part of the reason their teams finished where they did.

Do the names Andre Wiley, Mookie Blaylock, Tyrone Jones, Hank Ellis, Marvin Branch, Joe Young, Fred McCoy, Carlos Diggins and Buster Glover ring a bell?

Well, except for McCoy, Diggins and Glover, who play for K-State and might be known by a few loyal Wildcat fans, chances are the other young men named are new to most fans — but not likely for long.

These nine players are the brightest stars in the conference's crop of junior college transfers. Look for them to be as important as the "fab four" in determining who will be the Big Eight champ this season.

With K-State's success last season after an infusion of juco talent in the form of Richmond, Will Scott and Charles Bledsoe, several conference coaches began exploring the option of bringing in juco players to bolster their own teams.

And after Indiana won the national championship with Keith Smart, a juco transfer, leading the way, coaches went that direction in earnest.

"Ever since Bobby Knight (Indiana head coach) got a couple, it's like having the pope's blessing," Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs said of the infusion of juco talent into the conference for the coming season.

Let's take a quick look at the nine players mentioned and what each might mean to his team.

Before doing so, however, let's remember that this list is not an attempt to rate the newcomers to the conference in any way, just an attempt to let you get to know a bit more than the average fan going into the season.

■ Wiley, a 6-7 forward, joins the Oklahoma Sooners after leading the California jucos in scoring and rebounding for Compton. He was named first-team All-West among the juco players moving on to four-year schools by Street and Smith's Basketball magazine.

■ Blaylock, a 6-1 guard, was a juco All-American last season for Midland (Texas) juco, and will now take his considerable play-making talents to Oklahoma.

■ Jones, a 6-6 player who could be used as a swingman, was a juco All-American last year as well at Hutchinson, and will join Wiley and Blaylock at Oklahoma.

OU — with these players joined by 6-7 Michael Bell and 6-3 Arthur Pollard — may have plucked the cream of the juco crop in the conference.

■ Ellis, a 6-3 guard, joins the Oklahoma State Cowboys and Coach Leonard Hamilton after performing for Chowan (N.C.) junior college. Ellis was named first-team All-East by Street and Smith's.

■ Branch, a 6-10, 225-pounder, joins Manning on a tough Kansas frontline. Branch averaged 15.9 points per game and 10.7 rebounds per contest for Barton County juco last season.

■ Young, a 6-7 forward, also joins the KU frontline. Young averaged 16.9 points a contest for Dodge City last season. The addition of Branch and Young means teams will no longer be able to double- and triple-team Manning in the front court.

■ McCoy, a 6-7 forward, joins the Wildcats from Allen County. He wears Norris Coleman's old number — 44 — and the hope is that he will be that type of player as well — a tough rebounder and consistent scorer.

■ Diggins, a 6-4 guard, comes to K-State from Butler County, and joins Jones, Branch, Young and McCoy in a group of very talented Kansas juco players moving to Big Eight teams for the coming year. Diggins' size and moves make some K-State fans think of Rolando Blackman, now starring in the NBA for the Dallas Mavericks.

■ Glover, a 6-0 guard, joins juco teammate McCoy at K-State. If you remember, K-State plucked Richmond and Bledsoe from Moberly (Mo.) last season, and the Wildcats were able to pluck two players from yet another juco this year.

Although the use of junior college players could be considered by some a "quick fix," it also enables teams that might not be as strong otherwise to be competitive immediately.

With this competitiveness, coaches tell you, comes a better crop of high school freshmen to a program, and that builds a winning tradition.

It's Lon Kruger's hope, and the hope of every coach in the country, that by using juco stars today, their programs will reap benefits tomorrow.

Forum

Wefald said he believes the Margin of Excellence has gained the support of such leaders in the Legislature as Jim Braden, Joe Knopp, Robert Talkington and Bud Burke.

"The only one we have left to convince...is the governor," Wefald said. "We're still optimistic that we can get the governor's support. We're going to continue to press very, very hard."

Provost James Coffman, who addressed the issue of selective admissions at the forum, noted that students who enter K-State, the University of Kansas or The Wichita State University will have to complete the Regents' recommended preparatory high school curriculum with a grade point average of at least 2.0, have a composite American Collegiate Testing score of 23, or rank in the top one-third of their high school graduating class.

He also said remedial course work essentially will be eliminated at these same three institutions.

Coffman said it's a mistake that the 2.0 GPA and the ACT score of 23 are considered to be equal qualifications by the proposal.

"According to the regional ACT office in Denver, a GPA of 2.0 (is equivalent to) the 9th percentile and a composite ACT of 11," Coffman said. Based on this data, he said eliminating remediation "simply isn't realistic."

Coffman addressed other concerns about the effect of selective admissions on K-State's enrollment.

"First, it was estimated that we would lose 30 to 40 percent of freshmen enrollment... (especially) in the area of modern languages and to some extent, in science," Coffman said. He was referring to a survey done by the Board of Regents showing "a substantial number" of small school districts do not offer courses in foreign language.

Modern languages are included in the Board of Regents recommended curriculum, which students must pass with at least a 2.0.

"There are substantial difficulties focused on small school districts that have difficulty offering the specific courses," Coffman said. If schools are forced to comply with this kind of requirement and can't, Coffman said, then some of these small communities will have to consolidate school districts.

Coffman said that "at every level" people believe remediation should not be eliminated and a substitution of computer science, music or art be allowed for the language requirement. Another suggested alternative is for students to take the language at the college level if it is not offered at the high school level.

Minorities face "perceived and, in fact, real adverse effects" through selective admissions, Coffman said, as do smaller colleges and universities that say selective admissions may tend to "contribute to a division of institutions into first and second class institutions."

"This leads us to believe that it would be less than desirable for KU to enter into a selective admissions program alone for the same reason," Coffman said.

Coffman said he believed an "evolving point of view" exists among the universities that modifying the selective admissions proposal could remedy many of its problems.

One major modification is the "decoupling" of university budgets from enrollment figures, Coffman said.

think that he can appear to be a man without a compass," says Pete Teeley, a spokesman for Bush.

Whatever his challenges, not even Dole's sharpest critics dispute his success in the past 12 months. When Bush's standing dropped because of the Iran-Contra affair, it was Dole who rushed to fill a void. As a result, he stands even in the polls in Iowa, site of critical early caucuses, and is closer to Bush in nationwide surveys than he is to the rest of the field.

While some of his success resulted from Bush's misfortunes, Dole also is seen as a far stronger candidate than the man who was his party's 1976 vice presidential nominee or an also-ran in the race for the 1980 GOP presidential nomination.

By speaking openly of his poverty-shadowed youth and his triumph over disabling World War II wounds, Dole has allowed a more appealing side of his personality to emerge, where before there was only an image as a tough, caustic political infighter.

"He's a much different candidate that he was in 1976," when Dole ran as GOP vice presidential candidate and created a major controversy by labeling World Wars I and II and the Korean War as "Democrat wars."

Dole won the allegiance of former Labor Secretary William E. Brock, who quit the Cabinet to become Dole's full-time campaign manager last week. As a long-time acquaintance of Dole and a successful, established former member of Congress in his own right, Brock is expected to be able to deal as an equal with the candidate — something other aides aren't able to do.

precautions taken by Aggieville merchants and police, and the attitude exhibited by students.

"The students of K-State and Kansas University have demonstrated their pride in their universities and their respect for this community," said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

K-State spokesman Cy Wainscott credited the evening's success to a higher level of student awareness.

"Last year, I think the kind of attitude on the part of a few people — and it doesn't take more than a few — was: 'Well, gee whiz, we had a near-riot before, we want to have one in our time at school, too,'" he said. "I don't think that attitude prevailed at all this year (because) of an awareness of what the results were last year."

City Commissioner Richard Hayter gave credit to K-State students for the quiet evening.

"We were all kind of hoping that it would rain," Hayter said. "In hindsight, I think it's better that it didn't. It proves we can have this kind of a celebration without a riot."

Alvan Johnson, RCPD director, said he anticipates fielding equal numbers of policemen for the 1989 K-State-KU game in Manhattan.

"We'll probably do something similar next time," he said.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Peer counseling helps solve problems in math, chemistry

By The Collegian Staff

Peer counseling for minority engineers is not just for minorities and not just for engineering majors.

Sharon Green, junior in engineering, said, "Anyone at the University who needs help is welcome on a walk-in basis."

Karen Hummel, adviser of the peer counseling program for minority engineers, said the counseling is free and consists basically of academic tutoring.

"We provide students with skills they need in order to perform well academically," Hummel said.

The counseling program provides test files, study groups and freshman orientation.

The freshman orientation session meets three times a week. The first day, students concentrate on learning strategies to budget their time more wisely. The second day, students concentrate on math, and the third day is devoted to chemistry.

Although non-engineering majors are welcome to use the peer counseling program, the classes being tutored concentrate on problem solving.

"You have to learn to think mathematically. It's a whole different way of looking at the world," Hummel said.

Students who are peer counselors are paid and must have earned

A's or B's in the classes they are tutoring, Hummel said.

Daniel Rivas, peer counselor and freshman in engineering, took classes offered by K-State while he was in the Army before he became a full-time student.

Rivas, who tutors three hours a week, earned high enough grades in his classes to qualify him as a peer counselor.

He said he enjoys tutoring because it is easy money since he is very familiar with the classes in which he tutors.

Students interested in participating in the peer counseling program can pick up a schedule of classes being tutored in Seaton 20.

Boy begins cross-country flight

By The Associated Press

VANDENBERG AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — A 10-year-old boy who wants to be a fighter pilot set off Sunday on a cross-country flight he hoped would set a speed and distance record for his age group.

"He looked like a mini Tom Cruise in his leather jacket and flight goggles," said Lt. Col. Richard Hill, who watched young Erik Fiederer take off in a Cessna Centurion P-210. Cruise played the hot fighter pilot in the movie "Top Gun."

Some cockpit adjustments had to be made to accommodate Erik, who turns 11 on Nov. 21 and has been flying for only three months. He has to sit on a cushion to reach the controls.

Erik, of Santa Maria, was accompanied by his mother, Air Force Col. Nancy Fiederer, and flying instructor Daryle Crowder on the six-seat, single-engine plane.

Their first scheduled stop is Fort Lewis, Wash. From there, they are to head today, to McConnell Air Force Base near Wichita, Kan. They hope to reach their final destination, Patrick Air Force Base, Fla., tomorrow.

The speed mark will be measured between Fort Lewis and Patrick, while the entire trip will count toward the distance record, his mother said.

Among those seeing Erik off was 10-year-old Christopher Lee Marshall of Oceano, who in July became the youngest pilot to fly across the country.

Christopher, whose flight took four days and went directly from California, instead of the Erik's longer diagonal path, gave Erik an American flag and a nickel from the Antilles for good luck, Hill said.

Erik's mother, deputy commander for resources at the Western Space and Missile Center at Vandenberg, said her son has wanted to be a pilot "since he knew what a plane was."

Like many pilots who fly from coast to coast, Erik said his biggest concern was crossing the Rocky Mountains.

"There's a lot of updrafts and downdrafts," said the sixth-grade student.

Though Erik's longest previous trip was from the Air Force base to Paso Robles, about 50 miles north, and back, his cohorts seemed confident.

"He grasps things real easy. He's eager to learn, and he really loves to fly," said Crowder, an instructor at the Vandenberg Aero Club.

During a news briefing at the base Friday, Erik, who would like to go to the Air Force Academy and become a fighter pilot, said he was confident he'd set speed and distance records during the flight.

Chef demonstrates uses of flavor bases

Food preparation class prepares soups, sauces

James Kosec of L.J. Minor Corp. gives students in the food preparation and service class a presentation of the products the L.J. Minor Corp. makes. Kosec also assisted the students with cooking.

By Sally Neary
Collegian Reporter

Students in the food preparation and service class gained information and experience under the direction of a corporate chef Friday in Justin Hall.

James Kosec discussed the importance of using natural flavor bases in cooking. He is a corporate chef for L.J. Minor Corp., a food service company specializing in developing natural flavor bases for soups, sauces and gravies.

"It's important to talk about food bases because there is nothing about it in any textbooks. This is the only way to learn it," Kosec said.

Kosec compared different samples of food bases produced by Minor Corp. and those produced by other companies.

He said the Minor products use more than 35 percent meat in their bases, which is above the federal government requirement, and only 15 percent salt, which is the minimum government requirement. Minor products use no artificial colors or preservatives.

There are two things an individual has to do in the cooking business, Kosec said.

"Use quality products and know how to use them," he said. "You also have to know how to use leftovers. This is not taught in schools."

Kosec said students need to know about the products in order to make the right decisions when they are working in the hotel or restaurant industry.

"It was fun. My wife loves it when I come home and know more (about cooking) than she does."

—Nathan Thompson

Six students had the opportunity to use the flavor bases when they prepared chili, lobster bisque and a Vermont-style cheese soup. Three cooking stations were set up, and two students were assigned to each station. The other class members observed or helped the student cooks.

Nathan Thompson, senior in hotel/restaurant management, was one of the students who prepared the chili. He said he and his cooking partner were using the techniques they had learned this semester.

"It was fun," Thompson said. "My wife loves it when I come home and know more (about cooking) than she does."

"I feel it's good to have a professional from the industry come on campus and share his expertise and practical information," said Janice Dana, instructor in hotel/restaurant institutional management and dietetics.

"It was a pleasure to have Mr. Kosec here," she said. "His expertise adds a dimension to his presentation to students."

Kosec provided additional information concerning the cooking business.

"The labeling statement on a product is very important," he said.

Kosec said the name of the Minor Corp. bases is the first ingredient in the product. For example, pork is the first ingredient in the pork base.

Consistency is also important in developing a product, he said. Customers expect the same flavor and the same aroma when they order products.

Showcase of talent raises money Court

Sunset Zoo benefits from performances

By Linda Huddleston
Collegian Reporter

Performing in front of more than 600 people, on a stage lit only by a spotlight, is not a typical Friday night's activity for most college students.

However, Susie Unrein, sophomore in elementary education, did just that and garnered the grand prize in the female vocalist division of the 1987 KSU Showcase of Talent, sponsored by Sigma Chi fraternity.

"I think the show went over really well. It wouldn't have been possible without the support we received from the local businesses and people who helped us financially."

—Scott Jones

"The show was really fun and exciting," Unrein said. "I had a great time."

Unrein was one of about 100 students who performed in the talent contest, which was designed to raise money for the Sunset Zoo's improvement fund.

The show was hosted by John

Means, better known as Dr. Gonzo. Gonzo, who has opened for such performers as the Doobie Brothers and Huey Lewis and the News, kept most of the audience laughing throughout the show. He introduced the contestants, who performed in one of six categories: male vocalist, female vocalist, comedy, instrumental performance, a cappella group and large ensemble.

Scott Jones, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education and chairman of the Showcase project, said the show was a success considering it was a first-time event.

"I think the show went over really well," he said. "It wouldn't have been possible without the support we received from the local businesses and people who helped us financially."

The Showcase of Talent was the first-year replacement for University Sing, which was sponsored for 19 years by Sigma Chi and the Interfraternity Council. As a result of increasing expenses, the Interfraternity Council decided to drop its sponsorship of the program.

"We were lucky to find enough support to start up the new program," said Don Wixom, curator of education for the Sunset Zoo. "Our sponsors have helped us a lot, and we wouldn't have made it without them."

Jones and Wixom started planning the new event in April, and both said it wasn't easy.

"We kept in contact all summer trying to make plans," Jones said.

"Don has put in a lot of hard work to help make the show a success. We're pretty happy about the way it went off."

Winners of the Showcase categories were: male vocalist, Leslie

Lankhorst; female vocalist, Unrein; comedy, Ed Berridge; instrumental performance, Amy McAnaney; a cappella group, Streetside; and large ensemble, Lambda Chi Alpha and Kappa Kappa Gamma.

Southern conservative on the committee, said he prefers speedy action, but emphasized the need for a comprehensive background check to avoid the surprise revelations of the Ginsburg nomination.

"I think that it's wise to use perhaps maybe the language of the Supreme Court 'deliberate speed' pertaining to the movement of the next nominee," Heflin said on the same program.

"I would rather be right about this one and do it with deliberation rather than make a mistake," he said.

Specter, however, strongly disagreed and warned against any delay.

"I think March or April may well be too late," he said. "I believe you're going to see a very different political tone on this issue, if we go until March or April. ...If President Reagan is going to make this nomination, it had better come to fruition before April."

One judge mentioned as a possible new nominee, Anthony M. Kennedy of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, flew from California to the Washington area late Saturday. Kennedy traveled on an Air Force jet from McClellan Air Force Base near Sacramento to Andrews Air Force Base in suburban Maryland, according to a spokesman for the service.

Asked Sunday what he thought about Kennedy, Specter replied: "We do not know a great deal about Judge Kennedy, but I think we can move promptly. He gives the advantage of having quite a number of opinions."

Dole inititates campaign

Staff/Steve Wolgast

After announcing his presidential candidacy, U.S. Sen. Bob Dole and his wife Elizabeth wave at supporters Monday in downtown Russell.

In his speech, Dole outlined his campaign platform before departing for Iowa, New Hampshire, Georgia and North Carolina.

Russell citizens donate $100,000

By Candise Leonard
Government Editor

RUSSELL — Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., came home Monday to formally announce his campaign for the Republican nomination for president in 1988. Speaking before a crowd of almost 7,000 people, Dole said he had the determination to become the next president and was "confident he would be given the opportunity to make a difference."

"I came here today because my home is at the core of everything that I believe about America," he said. "Our families, our neighbors, our communities were at the center of everything we did."

Dole's 30-minute announcement was made from a platform at the corner of Eighth and Main streets, next to the drug store where he worked as a teen-ager.

G.V. "Bob" Dawson, former co-owner of the drug store, presented the senator with more than $100,000 in a cigar box with "the good wishes of the people in Russell...in the fervent hope you will be elected president of the United States."

Dawson told about the nickels, dimes and quarters placed in that cigar box to help pay medical bills as Dole recovered from an injury suffered in Italy during World War II.

"Bob never forgot that," Dawson said. "When he went to Congress...he placed it on his desk as a constant reminder of the generosity of the good people of Russell who came to his help when he really needed it."

Dole acknowledged the generosity of the people who "helped reshape my life."

"The goodness of the people of Russell over the years has been the source of inspiration and strength for me," he said.

In return, when Dole reached the podium, he presented Mayor Randy Mai with a gift of $10,000 from an anonymous donor who wanted it to "go to the poor people of Russell."

Included on the platform were Dole's wife, former Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole; Dole's daughter, Robin; Gov. Mike Hayden; Marie Boyd, wife of the late McGill "Huck" Boyd; Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum and Rep. Pat Roberts (R-Dodge City).

Roberts thanked Dole for his efforts for the 1st District and described him as a man who "knows the responsibility of preserving our freedoms and building upon the American dream for every generation."

Kassebaum introduced Dole as "one who has faced adversity and refused to be overwhelmed."

"In a real sense, Russell is what this campaign is all about," Kassebaum said. "It's about farmers, shop owners, mechanics, small-town bankers and all the people who built America."

She said Dole has been preparing for the presidency all of his life and "possesses the skill...of putting together a consensus from differing views."

The senator offered his "track record of 27 years of leadership" in government as a basis for bringing "common-sense answers to the complex problems facing America in its third century."

Dole described the federal budget deficit as the "single greatest threat to a prosperous and dynamic America," which drew cheers from the crowd. He pledged to tackle the problem "without raising tax rates," and to do whatever was necessary to approve a balanced budget amendment.

Appellate judge cited as leading candidate for court nomination

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House called federal appellate judge Anthony M. Kennedy the front-runner for the Supreme Court nomination Monday and subjected him to new background questioning as other Republicans doled out blame for the collapse of the Douglas Ginsburg nomination.

Kennedy, who was flown to Washington less than two weeks ago to be interviewed for the court vacancy, was brought back Saturday by Air Force jet after Ginsburg withdrew in the uproar following his admission that he had used marijuana.

"I think it's fair to say he is the leading candidate," White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said of Kennedy, of Sacramento, Calif.

President Reagan, meanwhile, said that harassment from outside rather than inside the administration forced Ginsburg to withdraw.

Reagan and other White House officials denied that Ginsburg had been abandoned after his drug-use admission. The president said, "I stood by and declared I would not withdraw him. He voluntarily made that decision on his own."

However, conservative Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, R-Utah, said Ginsburg wanted to fight it out but "gutless wonders" on the White House staff undermined the nominee and forced him to bow out.

Hatch blamed Reagan himself for failing to assert enough leadership in the unsuccessful nominations of Ginsburg and Robert H. Bork. Said the senator, "It's time for Ronald Reagan to take charge of the White House."

Attorney General Edwin Meese III met with Hatch and other senators Monday to discuss Reagan's third attempt to fill the vacancy left by the retirement last June of Lewis F. Powell.

Prior to Ginsburg's selection, the possibility of a Kennedy nomination faced serious opposition from Senate conservatives but was regarded as generally acceptable to majority Democrats.

Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., said at the time that some senators believed Kennedy was too liberal, and the White House was told there could be a filibuster against Kennedy if he were nominated. It was not clear whether Helms had changed his mind in light of Ginsburg's withdrawal.

A Democratic source from the Senate Judiciary Committee, speaking only on condition he not be named, said Democratic committee members placed Kennedy in their "least controversial" category among possibilities mentioned by White House officials.

Fitzwater said Kennedy, passed over last month by Reagan for the court vacancy, has been interviewed anew.

Hatch said in a television interview on Monday that conservatives might feel betrayed if Kennedy turns out to be "a moderate Republican who's going to not be there on a lot of the issues that the president stands up on."

ESU president objects to admissions plans

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — A proposal to tighten admission standards at some state universities in Kansas would give a bad image to other schools in the system, the president of Emporia State University said Monday.

Emporia State President Robert Glennen said at a news conference that he will ask the Kansas Board of Regents to consider a uniform admissions policy when it meets in Topeka next week.

The regents are considering a selective admissions plan to raise standards at the University of Kansas, Kansas State University and The Wichita State University. The plan will be discussed at the regents meeting this month, and a decision is expected in December.

Stanley Koplik, executive director of the board, has recommended that Kansas high school graduates meet one of three standards for admission to those three schools: complete a suggested preparatory curriculum with a 2.0 grade point average; score 23 or better on a scale of 36 on the ACT, or graduate in the top third of their classes. Universities could make exceptions for a number of students equal to 10 percent of the incoming freshman class.

Glennen said he opposes the plan because it does not treat all institutions the same and creates an "elitist system."

The focus of the proposal appears to be making KU the premier state university, Glennen said, adding that could be accomplished by making rigid enrollment standards for that school and by placing a cap on enrollment there.

Insurance contract 'counterproductive'

By Susan L'Ecuier
Collegian Reporter

Health insurance coverage for state employees is changing in ways that many K-State employees dislike.

President Jon Wefald, speaking Friday to a forum sponsored by the Faculty Senate, said the new contract is "very counterproductive...and a very severe blow to higher education in Kansas."

"This more than cancels out any salary increase that any of us are going to get in December," he said. "The 60-day waiting period is a very negative factor in terms of recruitment of faculty."

Carol Knepper is the vice president for negotiations/representation of Chapter 34 of the Kansas Association of Public Employees.

"We are no longer going to get the traditional Blue Cross and Blue Shield coverage. Now we are getting a choice between a modified Blue Cross and Blue Shield and HMO (Kansas)," she said.

Under HMO coverage, employees will have to select a primary physician for treatment. The primary physician can then either treat the employee or refer them to a specialist.

"I've been getting phone calls from people wanting to know what we're going to do about it," she said. Knepper is also a secretary for the Department of Environmental Design.

So far, KAPE has organized a demonstration in Topeka, she said.

Jennifer Gehrt, manager of employee benefits and records in Personnel Services, has been addressing the complaints and questions of K-State employees in small group sessions. One such session was held Monday for the Department of Environmental Design.

"One of the biggest things (complaints) is that people are having to choose a primary care physician, whereas before they didn't have to," Gehrt said after the meeting. "Also, there is an increase in the premium, and it's viewed as a decrease in service as opposed to what is considered an increase in cost."

The premium's increase is dependent upon the type of employee coverage.

Bernd Foerster, professor of environmental design, is not pleased with the new policy. He referred to federal employees who pay $26 a month for family coverage while state employees pay almost $200 a month for family coverage under the new contract. The contract was recently negotiated by the state's Employee Health Care Commission.

"I suggest that the state has not negotiated very well on behalf of their employees," Foerster said. "First of all, it's an enormous cost increase, and secondly, it gives you less choice and less opportunity."

"For instance, my wife and I are healthy and do not need to go to a regular physician, but we do occasionally choose to go to a chiropractor. Under the new plan, we would have to get a referral from a regular physician, which they normally just won't do (for chiropractors)," he said.

William Sullivan, assistant professor of environmental design, also expressed his displeasure at the change in coverage.

"(Asking for a referral) is a wasteful process. It wastes time and clearly wastes paperwork," Sullivan said.

The contract specifies that new employees must wait 60 days before coverage begins.

The contract, which takes effect in January, covers about 43,000 people, including 37,000 state employees and 6,000 retired state workers.

Polygraph board has problem

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Polygraphists, created by the Legislature during its last session to license people who administer lie detector tests, has run into a snafu.

The board must have five members — two private polygraphists, two law-enforcement polygraphists, all of whom must have administered 500 lie-detector tests in the last five years, and a member at-large. The at-large member cannot vote on "technical matters," including issuing licenses to polygraphists. Woerman said Monday the attorney general's office has been able to locate only one law-enforcement officer who meets the statutory requirement of administering 500 tests in the past five years — and that person retired from the Kansas Bureau of Investigation last spring.

Three people have been appointed to the board already — two private polygraphists, Steve Starr of Topeka and Gary Davis of Wichita. Crawford County Attorney Carla Stovall of Pittsburg has been appointed as the at-large member, but cannot vote on technical matters. That means the board cannot get a quorum.

Ad draws strong response

NEW YORK — An advertisement calling for a bipartisan plan to reduce the federal budget deficit has drawn such a strong response that another ad is planned for later this week, a group of former Cabinet officers said Monday.

Nearly 200 top business executives, lawyers and former government officials signed the first ad, which filled two pages of Monday's editions of The New York Times.

"We've been receiving a lot of calls from people who wanted to add their names but they didn't do it in time," said Peter G. Peterson, secretary of commerce in 1972-73. "We'll probably run another ad in a few days."

Seven former U.S. Treasury secretaries and six other former Cabinet members signed the statement, along with such business leaders as Chrysler Chairman Lee Iacocca and the chairman of Eastman Kodak, Xerox, Mobil and AT&T.

They endorsed multiyear deficit reductions aimed at balancing the budget by 1992, including a cut of $30 billion to $40 billion in the first year; cuts in all spending except programs for the poor; tax increases, if needed, that do not discourage consumption but do encourage savings and investment; more global economic cooperation to right trade deficits, stimulate Third World growth and share military and economic burdens with American allies.

USSR rewriting criminal codes

MOSCOW — The government announced Monday that it is rewriting its criminal code to abolish internal exile as punishment, narrow the list of death penalty offenses and shorten the maximum prison term from 15 to 10 years.

The proposed overhaul of the nation's 30-year-old criminal code by a government review committee was discussed by Justice Minister Boris V. Kravtsov in an interview with the official Tass news agency.

Kravtsov was quoted as saying consideration was also being given to broadening the rights of defense lawyers, presumably to allow them better access to information obtained during criminal investigations.

IRA: Bomb meant for soldiers

ENNISKILLEN, Northern Ireland — The Irish Republican Army said Monday it planted the bomb which killed 11 civilians and injured 63 at war memorial services, but that it meant to kill soldiers and the bomb went off prematurely.

The attack stirred a wave of revulsion on both sides of the Irish island, from Protestants and Roman Catholics alike.

In a statement to Irish news media, the outlawed IRA sought to excuse the high civilian toll by saying the 40-pound bomb should have blown up as soldiers marched by during the Remembrance Day ceremony for fallen British soldiers.

Instead, it said British forces set off the bomb with high-frequency scanning devices that have jammed and neutralized other IRA explosives in the past.

The statement, coded in a way that vouched for its authenticity, described the deaths as "catastrophic consequences" and said, "we deeply regret what occurred."

Britain's top official in the province, Northern Ireland Secretary Tom King, called the IRA statement "utterly disgraceful."

"I suppose what they mean to say is they didn't mean to kill these people, they meant to kill other people instead," he said in an interview with Channel 4 television.

The army press office in London refused to comment on what it called a "contemptible statement by terrorist organizations who admitted responsibility for the bomb."

Bomb kills 32 in Sri Lanka

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — A bomb exploded on a major road where thousands of commuters waited for buses home Monday, blowing people to bits and setting vehicles ablaze. Police said at least 32 people were killed and 105 injured.

Rescue workers put the death toll at more than 50 and said it may reach 70.

Whether the bomb was planted inside a car or bus was not known. It went off at about 5:40 p.m. near a police station and a main bus stop slightly over a mile east of downtown Colombo.

Thousands of people had lined the Maradana Road waiting for buses home to the eastern suburbs.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility. Police at the scene blamed nationalist Sinhalese opposed to a peace pact arranged by India to end the civil war by rebels of the Tamil minority, although the Maradana area and eastern suburbs are mainly Sinhalese.

Kidnapping claim challenged

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials Monday challenged claims by the Abu Nidal Palestinian terrorist group that it kidnapped eight Israelis from a yacht off the heavily guarded coast of the occupied Gaza Strip.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin described the hostage-taking claim as an attempt by Palestinian extremists to undermine an Arab summit that convened Sunday in Jordan.

Increasing uncertainty surrounded the affair, with doubts cast about the identity of the terrorist group, the identities of the reported victims, and even whether a kidnapping occurred.

Walid Khaled, a senior lieutenant in a Palestinian group claiming to represent Abu Nidal, told reporters Sunday the group captured eight Israelis from the 43-foot French-registered yacht Silko off the Gaza Strip.

K-State, city bid for food safety facility University Inn would expand

By Julie Key
Collegian Reporter

K-State and the City of Manhattan have put together a proposal to move the Federal Food Safety and Inspection Service training facility from Fort Worth, Texas, to Manhattan.

A division of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the service is wanting to relocate near a university. The service is responsible for the inspection and quality assurance of meat and poultry in the nation. The facility is used to train food inspectors and update their skills.

"They feel their best future is associated with a university for research, technical facilities and laboratories," said Bill Muir, director of economic development at K-State.

The proposal, submitted Sept. 30 to the USDA, recommends the construction of a 24,400-square-foot facility immediately east of the University Inn. The property, owned by the KSU Foundation, is mainly a parking lot. Also located on the property are the International Trade Center, the Warehouse Building, which houses part of the continuing education division, and an apartment building.

The City of Manhattan has created a Public Building Commission that would own the building, Muir said. The building would then be leased to K-State, which would lease it to the USDA on a five-year contract at about $3 million a year.

The lease agreement would include lodging and instructional costs for trainees, but would not cover the service's expenditures for faculty and staff or for trainees' food and travel.

The facility would bring more than 3,000 people a year to Manhattan to be trained in food inspection.

"That's a substantial impact on the economy in this region," Muir said.

City Manager Mike Conduff estimates the facility would add $14.9 million to the Manhattan economy during the proposed five-year contract.

In addition to the estimated economic impact of the facility, a Foundation newsletter listed four reasons why K-State submitted a contract bid:

■ Kansas is a major food processing state. A quality, efficient food inspection program would help the state maintain that position.

■ The training center would bring additional prestige to the University. K-State would become identified as a national leader in training food inspectors, since the program's trainees are responsible for food safety in the United States.

■ The University offers a food safety program, Food Technologist Continuing Education Program, that is highly rated by the service.

■ The program would also complement K-State's food and meat sciences and public health safety.

"We might be able to get involved in cooperative research projects (with the USDA) that we would not otherwise get involved in," said Michael Dikeman, professor of meat sciences.

"Our key asset is the University, due to its high quality of faculty and program," Conduff said.

The building would cost $2.4 million and would include five classrooms, a multipurpose "wet" laboratory, a computer laboratory, office space and reception areas.

The building commission would issue revenue bonds for the construction of the facility. The owners of University Inn have agreed to the construction of at least 100 more rooms to house the trainees.

"It is a mutual agreement with K-State; both parties will benefit greatly from it," said Dan Richards, general manager of University Inn. Due to the number of people the facility would bring in, Richards said they could keep the additional rooms filled all year, but the new wing would not be reserved specifically for the trainees.

Muir said about 30 universities requested a proposal form.

A team from USDA offices in Denton, Texas, and Washington, D.C., was at K-State Nov. 2 viewing the site and the University.

"They are going to a number of sites, to inspect where the facility would be located and also the support services that are available on the campus," said Muir.

The USDA hopes to make a selection by Dec. 1.

"I think we're in a good position. We've put together a good contract, but you never know what they (USDA) are thinking about," Muir said.

USDA's assistance programs help farmers deal with crisis

By Jackie Brazzle
Collegian Reporter

Farmers would be less able to handle their present crisis and possible future crisis without the help and research of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, said Charles Gentry, area conservationist for Riley County.

An example of the USDA's importance is shown in soil conservation.

The Soil Conservation Service's program stresses soil and water conservation planning, and design assistance to farmers to prevent erosion control, Gentry said.

However, the service's emphasis is shifting due to the Food and Security Act of 1985, he said. This act requires farmers to have a conservation plan by 1990 and installment of the needed practices by 1995 on all highly erodible fields.

In order to receive any USDA benefits, this requirement must be met.

"The end result is that most farmers cannot survive without benefits from the USDA," Gentry said. "They basically need to apply to survive."

The service is one of five agencies of the USDA located in Manhattan. Of the five, the Soil Conservation Service and the U.S. Grain Marketing Research Laboratory conduct research projects with the University.

The conservation service recently finished a soil survey with K-State's tants. Graduate students also work on their thesis research at the laboratory.

William McGaughey, research leader of the biological unit and professor of entomology, said the mission of the lab is "to develop knowledge, information and technologies needed to solve problems associated with harvest, storage and marketing."

"The end result is that most farmers cannot survive without benefits from the USDA."

—Charles Gentry

The lab primarily studies wheat and corn, but does some work with rice, barley, oats, soybeans and triticale, a man-made cereal that is a cross between wheat and rye. The labwork stresses the utilization and overall quality and end-use properties of cereal grains.

"We are concerned with the preservation of grain quality during the marketing process," McGaughey said.

Besides working with farmers to develop methods of storage and pest control, the laboratory also works with grain elevator operators, cooperatives and plant breeders to evaluate varieties of wheat for good baking quality.

The Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, Farmers Home Administration and the Federal Crop Insurance Corp. are three offices located in Manhattan that are agencies of the USDA, but they do not have a direct connection with K-State.

The stabilization service implements, administers and funds the federal farm programs to recipients. Their offices are located in every county in Kansas, except Wyandotte.

"In a nutshell, we are the funding agency for a lot of programs through the USDA," said Frank Mosier, state executive director of the service.

The agency works with acreage reduction programs aimed at trying to reduce surpluses, helps make partial payments on soil conservation and providing subsidies or loans to farmers who put up their grain for capital.

Mosier said in 1985 the agency issued a total of $482 million in farm payments. In 1986, the figure increased to almost $1 billion.

"For the state of Kansas, that is pretty good industry," Mosier said.

The Farmers Home Administration provides loans to rural homes and rural families directly or through a guaranteed loan program using another lending agency, said Jim Parker, district loan specialist.

"We operate something like a bank or savings and loan, except we are through the U.S. Agricultural Department," Parker said.

FHA has 41 county offices, six districts and a state office. The district offices work on community facility projects dealing with non-profit organizations and local government. It also deals with rural rental housing loans for families and senior citizens in towns with a population less than 20,000.

Parker said rural rental housing is similar to what the federal department of Housing and Urban Development does.

"We serve basically the same income level, except that they work in urban areas and we work in rural areas," Parker said.

The county offices handle agricultural and housing loans in towns less than 10,000 population.

Parker said FHA applicants must be unable to get aid from a regular bank or savings and loan.

"We offer another avenue. That way we don't compete with the other lending institutions," he said.

The Federal Crop Insurance Corp. provides all-risk insurance to farmers for major crops from loss from natural hazards.

Joe Ellis, assistant field operations director, said crop insurance insures the farmer's crop from the time it is planted to the time it is harvested.

"We guarantee the farmer's investment return. This is so he does not have to borrow money to cover his loss and it is not taken out of his next five years' profits," Ellis said.

Ellis sees an added financial benefit for the state. He said in 1986 more than $20 million was paid to Kansas farmers.

"That is just that many more dollars that would not have been here otherwise," Ellis said.

Extension Service. They also do projects with agricultural engineers, civil engineers, the Department of Agronomy and the Career Planning and Placement Center.

A conservation commission is located in every county to provide engineering assistance to farmers in developing soil conservation techniques.

Since the conservation work farmers do is voluntary, Gentry said, the program should continue for a longer period of time.

"If farmers do this because they want to, they will hopefully maintain the conservation methods better than if they were forced to do it," Gentry said.

The grain research laboratory is actually a part of the Agricultural Research Service. Plant science, entomology and wind erosion are areas of research being done with K-State. The service employs about 15 K-State students and research assisof insect pests of stored grain.

McGaughey said the majority of this research is done because of the problems insects present in both domestic and imported grain.

"Insects are very harmful to our competitive position in the world grain market," he said.

The engineering section researches the development of improved methods for handling grain to decrease losses and of improved methods for drying grains.

The grain quality unit has a baking lab that determines a grain's quality for baking.

McGaughey said the importance of the marketing service has increased in recent years due to grain overproduction.

"The national importance has increased because of the overproduction of grain in the United States, and because of the need to more competitively and aggressively market this grain around the world," he said.

Educating men key to stopping rape

Myths cloud reality of assaults

One out of every three women will be sexually assaulted at some time in their lives. Ninety percent of rapes in America today go unreported, and 60 percent to 70 percent of all rapes are at least partly planned beforehand by rapists. The stereotypical image of a black man raping a white woman is a foolish misconception, as these assaults constitute only 3 percent of all cases.

Most rape cases involve an aggressor and a victim of the same race and socio-economic class. Perhaps more importantly though, more than half of the rapes in the United States are acquaintance rapes (forced intercourse by someone known to the victim), although they account for less than half of the incidents reported to police.

All of the above statistics were reported by the FBI and issued by the Department of Social Services, Missouri Division of Health. These and many other facts on rape prevention can be found at the Women's Resource Center, Holton 111.

"Research shows that up to 35 percent of college men would rape a woman if they thought they could get away with it," said Katherine Parker, acting director of the Women's Resource Center. "That's about one-third of men," she said, "but there are still two-thirds out there who wouldn't rape a woman...they have too much respect for themselves as individuals and too much respect for women, to do that. But how does that one-third make all the other men feel?"

Good question.

As a man and a college student, I can safely say that the figures rather sicken me. Although 35 percent is just a national average and may not accurately reflect the situation at K-State, it is still a significant indication that you and I probably know at least a few men who would commit a sexual crime against a woman. This may be hard to swallow, but it would be naive to assume that K-State is the only university in the nation in which this doesn't occur. The fact that you wouldn't commit a rape does not exclude the possibility that one or more of your acquaintances would do so.

Acquaintance rapes, or date rapes as they are more commonly known, are the most prevalent form of rape in college communities such as ours. Many forced sex events occur in places where the victim feels safe: her own home or the home of the attacker, reports Andrea Parrot, of the Department of Human

MICHAEL NICHOLS
Collegian Columnist

Service Studies at Cornell University. Parrot contends that once the couple is in a setting in which the forced sex can occur, the aggressor is likely to threaten his victim, many times with pain or death.

How can women prevent acquaintance rapes? Most specialists advise that women avoid being placed in vulnerable situations with people they don't know well. Submissive actions and compliance with early actions by an aggressor seem only to worsen the situation. Women must be assertive about their feelings and make their partners fully aware of what they are expected not to do. Furthermore, women should avoid going out with men who have previously acted violently while intoxicated, or who have seriously denigrated women or their rights at an earlier instance.

College communities are ideal settings for date rapes. First of all, most rapists are men between 15 and 24 years old, the age of a majority of men in a college town. Secondly, sexual behavior tends to be looser in a college environment. Although sexual expectations may not be as important to all students, they nevertheless play a significant role in the daily lives of most people — as shown by TV, movies, magazines or even music. Also, the consumption of large quantities of alcohol or illegal drugs is often associated with cases of date rape, many times serving to wear down the victim's protests. One need only look back into old Collegian issues — at the cases of young women finding themselves in a hospital for alcohol poisoning — to reaffirm the notion that drinking is a very popular habit at K-State.

Unfortunately, date rape is one of the most underreported crimes afflicting society today. Some researchers estimate that only one out of every 100 cases are actually reported to the authorities. Why? The blame certainly can't be attributed to the women in question. The notion that women bring rapes upon themselves is not only sexist and bigoted but a very stupid misconception of reality. Society is at fault for preserving the archaic idea that men must be aggressive and women submissive.

The problem isn't with women, it's with men. The driving force of rape is not sex, it's violence. Forcing sex upon a victim is only a means to inflict pain and degrade the victim; sexual satisfaction is not the purpose. The victims feel shame, guilt and/or embarrassment, and the subsequent withdrawal or alienation they impose on themselves is just a way to forget the situation.

Quoting Parker once more: "The only way to successfully stop rape is to get men to stop raping. Women can try to prevent rape, but what guarantees do they have?" No matter how many precautions are taken, women cannot always prevent the crime, be it committed by an acquaintance or a total stranger.

Educating women is necessary, but to stop the evil at its root, reaching men must be the top priority. That is where the real problem is: The vast majority of men are either uninterested or are offended by the suggestion they should be taught about rape. Unlike many other universities across the nation, K-State has no male-sponsored rape prevention program. Maybe it is time something should be done about that.

Person who stole art reaches despicable low

Apparently, monetary value is no longer a strong motivating factor when it comes to stealing.

For those who don't believe that, just ask the four students who had their artwork stolen from McCain Auditorium the weekend of Oct. 23. The works, which were done as part of a class project, were taken sometime before the morning of Oct. 26, and campus police have no leads in the case.

While this is not the most earth-shattering crime ever to be committed on campus, it — along with similar acts — certainly must be considered among the most juvenile and frustrating.

Why would anyone wish to steal a worthless (monetarily speaking) piece of artwork? Especially from a student?

The works were displayed solely to give students an opportunity to show off their talents to those who visit K-State and McCain. That weekend, hundreds of theater patrons visited McCain for the production of "South Pacific."

The works weren't hung to give someone a momentary feeling of "satisfaction" or "accomplishment" by stealing them.

Although it's too late for the thief to erase the despair he or she caused the artists, it's not too late for that person to give the art back. That's most likely all the students want now.

So, to the thief: You've had your fun, and you've pulled your prank. Now take some responsibility in your life and give the art back.

Why? Because it's the right thing to do.

Marijuana confessions not always best thing

It's currently in vogue to make confessions.

Confessions baring the oh-so-awful truth that yet another public administrator has chanced to partake of "the weed," "pot," marijuana or whatever his/her public spokesperson deems appropriate.

Monday, U.S. Sen. Lawton Chiles, D-Fla., reported he had once smoked marijuana. His expected challenger, U.S. Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fla., had already admitted to smoking the illegal substance.

Unfortunately, this is only one example of confessions which are taking place around the country. On Saturday, two democratic presidential candidates, Sen. Albert Gore Jr. of Tennessee and former Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt, disclosed they had used marijuana in their youth.

And it all started with a U.S. Supreme Court nominee.

It would seem that after Judge Douglas Ginsburg made his "starting" announcement that he made mistakes during his youth — smoking marijuana — politicians couldn't get a similar speech drawn up fast enough.

Each "true confession" follows the same pattern: "I, (fill in the blank), a high ranking official in the U.S. government, have at one point in the clouded judgment of my youth smoked marijuana. I have never used the substance since that vague date many days...er...years ago. I know now that what I did was incredibly wrong, and I can only urge everyone — especially children — to just say 'no' to drugs of any type."

And so the story ends, the politician admits to a sin, and the public yawns — wondering what even juicier sins are waiting to be uncovered.

These politicians gave in to peer pressure once when they used illicit substances. Must they do it again and bare their souls for the world?

Some things are left better unsaid.

Learn to teach

Editor,

Although it certainly is a good idea to give freshmen alternatives to make it through selective admissions, I have a problem with new freshmen having to take nine hours of summer school earning a GPA of 2.0. The problem does not come with the 2.0 GPA, it is with the amount of hours. Why are nine hours of summer classes required? Six hours is full-time during the summer. How many advisers would advise a first semester freshman, who has had problems making a 2.0 GPA in high school, to take 18 hours during a regular semester? If our advisers are doing their job, I certainly hope that number is quite low. I think we need an alternative to the proposed alternative.

While I'm on the subject of higher education, I would like to address another concern to University students (especially those taking a math course). Without intending to sound hostile, I believe that K-State has a very good College of Education. The instructors in this college are there to do just that, educate the students. Most instructors in this department have been certified to teach. I dare to challenge other departments to find out how many of their instructors have taken methods courses in their content area so that their certification guarantees they know how to teach their content.

I believe some math instructors could take some lessons here. When the first test of the semester is given and 58 percent of the lecture class flunks it, there needs to be some evaluating done. Just as evaluating needs to be done after giving a second test on which 84 percent of the lecture class scores below 70 percent.

In my education classes we learn that there is definitely a problem. Judge for yourself. Is the instructor to blame? Was the test too difficult? Was there too little time to complete the exam? Or, do the students take responsibility? I believe the most accurate answer is all of the above.

I'm sure some instructors would like to think the students should take all the blame. Come on — 84 percent didn't study? Don't get me wrong, there are some fantastic instructors in the math department.

Maybe K-State instructors should be required to take a methods course in education before they are allowed to teach. It sure couldn't hurt!

Thanks, K-State

Editor,

As a former student and recent alum, I have seen many of the successes and strong points of K-State. I consider one of these strong points to be the K-State bloodmobile.

Although appointments were down this fall, the students pulled together to do some last-minute recruitment for the visit. The visit was a huge success! Again K-State topped its goal of 1,400 units of blood by collecting 1,525 units. Three hundred sixty-two students donated blood for the first time.

Sincere thanks should go to all students, faculty and staff, who donated either their blood or their time to a lifesaving cause.

Dole support

Editor,

The story that ran in the Nov. 6 Collegian dealing with the Bob Dole video program was generally correct, but did contain a factual error.

The article insinuates that the College Republicans are backing Bob Dole for the Republican nomination. Individual members can support whomever they wish, but as a group we cannot back a candidate until he or she is nominated by the Republican Party.

Parking solution

Editor,

As we all know, K-State has a parking problem. My gripe is the problem we have at night. "Free Parking" begins after 7:30 p.m., and 95 percent of the night classes begin before this. Therefore, if you only drive at night and don't have a parking permit, you risk getting an $8 parking ticket.

My solution is to allow "Free Parking" at the farther lots, such as the lots east of McCain, beginning at 5:30 p.m. Let the parking lot south of the Union, which is close to everything and is always used, begin free parking after 7:30 p.m. This is something we need to consider.

Stewart hoping MU can reclaim crown

By Chase Clark
Sports Writer

Once again another year has gone by and not much has changed with University of Missouri basketball coach Norm Stewart and his basketball program.

Stormin' Norman is entering his 21st year as the Tigers' chief. For the fourth time since 1980, the Tigers are picked to win the conference in the media's preseason poll. That's nothing new to Stewart, his teams have won the trophy five times since 1979-80.

Once again Missouri has an All-American candidate in senior forward Derrick Chievous. Missouri has had 16 All-Americans in basketball over the years.

After surprising many people and winning the conference race and the Big Eight Tournament, Missouri is looking to improve on last year's 24-10 record. Nothing new about that. Missouri has had 10 seasons with 20 or more wins in the last 15 years.

It seems as if things never change at Mizzou. But each year is different in its own special way.

"We're going to do a lot of things different than we did last year," said senior guard Lynn Hardy. "We're just going to go out and play a lot harder and not look ahead of each team we play."

"I say we'll press more because we have more depth. You can rotate players in and give the players in the game a rest. Right now we're working our new players in. It's more competitive now and everybody is trying to fight for a spot...but it just makes for a better team," Hardy said.

Everybody on the Missouri squad is confident they can put it together and reach the NCAA tournament for the seventh time in the last nine years.

"With everybody returning and having come off of a championship year...I'll show a lot of confidence in them at the start," Stewart said. "It wouldn't be fair to them if I didn't show confidence, because they proved themselves last year."

NORM STEWART... hoping to repeat as champion.

"There's some cautious optimism in regards to us," Stewart said.

"There are so many good teams and so many good coaches that it's hard to repeat. But one thing we've always been able to do is be involved in the championship process."

With Missouri returning nine of last year's 12 lettermen, the Tigers are the preseason pick to win the Big Eight crown.

"Derrick Chievous is going to be the first 2,000-point scorer in the history of Missouri basketball," Stewart said. "He's got a great knack for getting the ball in the hoop, getting fouled and making the free throw. He's a tremendous rebounder...and a fun guy."

Chievous' performance last year wasn't the only star effort on the team. Sophomore guard Lee Coward made a last second, winning shot against Kansas in Columbia, Mo., and in the Big Eight Tournament. And Stewart will be forever grateful.

"I just told Lee," Stewart said, "last year he made two shots against Kansas University in the last second. I told him, 'Hell, I don't care if you ever play again, just come out and stay at the house...'"

Missouri's talent doesn't stop there, though. Stewart is hoping for a shining year from Hardy as well.

"Boy, I'm hoping Lynn has a great year, because if he doesn't there isn't any justice. He worked his tail off all four years and is working just as hard or harder now as when he was a freshman," he said.

Stewart is hoping to see a more aggressive junior center Gary Leonard on the floor this season. He's also hoping sophomore forward Nathan Buntin can improve on his outstanding performance as a starter last year. Junior forward Mike Sandbothe is expected to have another fine season as well.

Junior forward Greg Church and sophomore center Bradd Sutton should help the team in a reserve role again this season.

Determination and confidence are what Missouri basketball is all about and senior guard Devon Rolf may be the perfect example of that. Rolf went to a junior college for two years hoping to be noticed by Stewart and receive a scholarship to Mizzou. When that didn't happen he walked onto the program and has been a part of Missouri basketball ever since.

There are two freshmen players on Missouri's squad who should make an impact this season. Freshman center Doug Smith has tremendous talent according to Stewart and is a good rebounder. Another freshman center, Jim Horton, is a graduate of Hickman High School in Columbia. Stewart feels Horton is a better player than the central Missouri natives think he is.

Then there are the two players who sat out last season after transferring to Missouri — sophomore guard John McIntyre and junior guard Byron Irvin. They are technically newcomers to the program, but they've been around Missouri basketball for a year now and should fit right in.

Even with the four newcomers to the squad and the departure of three players, the squad feels the magic of last season is still there.

"The camaraderie of our teammates is still there," Chievous said. "I feel we have a together unit and we play together and we hang out together. This is (the last year for many of us), so we want to go out in style. So we are going to be on our P's and Q's and play as hard as we can."

Meyer, McCoy to occupy 'pivotal' position

By Jeff Rapp
Sports Editor

Previous records tell us that Ron Meyer and Fred McCoy are not the same type of basketball player.

Last season, in a reserve role, Meyer averaged 3.7 points and 3.1 rebounds per game at K-State. McCoy, on the other hand, averaged 22 points and 11 rebounds per contest at Allen County Community College.

As different as they may seem, though, the two will be vying this season for the starting pivot position on K-State's basketball squad, so Head Coach Lon Kruger has some decisions to make.

For now, it appears Kruger's first choice is Meyer. In an interview Monday, Kruger said Meyer — along with forwards Charles Bledsoe and Mitch Richmond and guards Mark Dobbins and Steve Henson — will start when the Wildcats take on the Spirit Express at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House. (The Express is a ministry team of former college basketball players that travels the continent taking on teams from various institutions.)

Meyer's selection as a starter may have a lot to do with the fact that unlike during past seasons, this season the 6-foot-9 senior is not hampered by injury. Also, during the offseason he lost weight and increased his mobility.

"I've been plagued with a lot of injuries throughout my career here and last season I had never really had a chance to recuperate from (the injuries) because the games were coming so quick," Meyer said.

"Finally, this summer, I just got the time to take care of it and I started doing a lot of running to get my legs strengthened. It's all paid off so far," he said.

Meyer's first payoff came in the Wildcats' "Midnight Madness" scrimmage Oct. 15. Not only did he look uncharacteristically mobile and quick, but he scored 14 points and blocked a shot.

Without having to worry about any of his various past injuries, Meyer said it's easier to play aggressively because he can be less cautious on the court.

"My legs feel healthy and they're not hurting," Meyer said. "You jump a lot better when you're confident that you're not going to come down on someone's foot and twist your knee, so I think a lot of (what helps me) is just confidence in being healthy again."

Although McCoy is not hampered by injury, he arrived in Manhattan this year a bit on the pudgy side, pushing 240 pounds. That's compared to a 225-pound "ideal" playing weight.

"When I first got here, I had been home all summer and was a little overweight, but I have been running and the coach (Kruger) has got me into pretty good shape," McCoy said.

Both McCoy and Kruger said the 6-foot-7 junior transfer, originally from Washington, D.C., now weighs "about 232 pounds" and needs to shed around seven more to be at his best.

"He carries his weight very well and uses it well," Kruger said. He uses his size and his bulk to his advantage. He's not ever going to look like a trim, fit greyhound, but he didn't look that bad when he came here."

Weight problems aside, McCoy — although he may have an edge on scoring talent over Meyer — knows he won't be relied on heavily for offense at K-State like he was at Ron Meyer are both eyeing the position of starting center for the 'Cats when the season opens Saturday.

Allen County.

"I'm not looking to carry the team now (in scoring), I'm looking to be selective (with my shots)," McCoy said. "At (Allen County) I looked to shoot as much as possible because the offense was centered on me. Now I have to plan on making it a team concept and hit the open shots when I get them."

His scoring ability has been mentioned on many occasions, but scoring is not what McCoy said is the key to his personal success.

"They all said my scoring is my best asset, but I like to rebound...because if you rebound, you win games and I like to win, so I try to work on my rebounding."

Anyone who attended the mid-night scrimmage may have noticed an apparent lack of fear (or selectivity) by McCoy to shoot the ball. He said there was a definite reason for his boldness that night.

"Well, the adrenaline really was flowing (in the scrimmage). It was a nice night because there were a lot of people (in Ahearn). It was just a nice experience," McCoy said.

Bowlers place fourth

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's bowling team took fourth in a 12-team field at the Mid-States bowling tournament held this past weekend at the North Kansas City Pro Bowl in Kansas City, Mo.

Junior Herb Halinski was the highest scoring K-State bowler in the tourney, with a 213.3 average.

As a team, K-State averaged 198.7 pins per game and posted an 8-5 record. One notable team the 'Cats defeated was West Texas State University, who was ranked as one of the 20 best teams in the nation by the Bowling Writers Association of America.

The Wichita State University, who was ranked No. 1 by the association, won the tournament.

Cause of death determined

By The Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — A medical examiner determined Monday that Jim Fitzgerald, winningest driver in Sports Car Club of America history, died of a broken neck when he crashed his car during the St. Petersburg Grand Prix.

Fitzgerald, a racing partner of actor Paul Newman, smashed a Nissan 300ZX Turbo into a concrete barrier on the third lap of Sunday's 100-mile Trans Am race on a downtown street course.

The coroner's office said Fitzgerald, 65, died instantly of a broken neck. An autopsy performed by Associate Medical Examiner Dr. John C. Gallagher found no evidence of a heart problem, spokesman Larry Bedore said.

Newman, who left Florida for his home in Connecticut late Sunday, was running fifth when the accident occurred. The 62-year-old actor withdrew when his Nissan 300ZX Turbo failed to start when the race resumed after a 40-minute delay.

Fitzgerald won more than 350 SCCA national races in a career that spanned 32 years.

"We're all in shock and disarray over this," said Peter Slater, a spokesman for Newman-Sharp Racing in Danbury, Conn.

Dismay shrouds Big Eight

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — There seems to be greater frustration and unhappiness than usual around Big Eight football camps this week. Oklahoma State is morose because the Cowboys feel they should have beaten No. 1 Oklahoma Saturday.

Missouri is unhappy for playing poorly against Colorado, which almost surely means another losing season despite signs of improvement.

Frustration reigns at Kansas and K-State. Unless the Wildcats pull off an upset Saturday at Iowa State, they and the Jayhawks are likely to go the entire season without a Big Eight victory. For Kansas State, it would mean a season without a victory of any kind. Such are the frustrations of playing to a 17-17 tie, as the two rivals did last week.

But perhaps nobody has more to be unhappy about than Oklahoma. Two weeks away from a storied No. 1 vs. No. 2 showdown with Nebraska, the Sooners have lost their quarterback and fullback. Jamelle Holieway, the only freshman ever to quarterback a team to a national championship, is out for the year. His replacement is Charles Thompson, a redshirt freshman who's quicker than quick but no Jamelle Holieway. Also gone is big, strong, fast fullback Lydell Carr.

Oklahoma Coach Barry Switzer can only guess how Thompson will perform in his first start Saturday at home against Missouri. He chooses not to guess what the slender freshman may do the following week when the country tunes in to Nebraska.

"Obviously, we're not as good a football team," Switzer said Monday during the Big Eight's weekly teleconference. "When you lost two great players you're not going to be as good. We lost a great player at quarterback who had started for three years and now we play a freshman. We're not going to be as good. I don't know to what degree. We're still a good defensive team and that's what's really important."

Thompson has looked spectacular on several plays when the reserves go into games after the first-teamers put it away.

"But there's a difference when the score is 35-0 and 0-0," Switzer said. "That's the unknown."

Therapist licensing needed, group says

By Michelle Engemann
Collegian Reporter

A marriage and family therapist group contends the public may be harmed because state certification is not required of therapists.

Currently there is no state statute requiring certification or licensing of marriage and family therapists, said Cathy Rooney, representative of the Kansas Association of Marriage and Family Therapists. Certification would prevent unauthorized or unqualified people from practicing under the title "marriage and family counselor."

Jim Beer, chairman of the Legislative Committee for the Kansas Association of Marriage and Family Therapists, said there are three major reasons for requiring certification.

"Anyone can practice, regardless of their qualifications," he said.

"Consumers can't distinguish between someone who is qualified and someone who isn't. And there is no recourse for a harmed client."

Civil suits can be filed by clients who think they have been harmed through therapy, but it is difficult to prove incompetence, Beer said. The process can also take much time and money.

"There are no practice-related consequences like losing their license, and no means of educating clients as to ethical behavior," he said. "Sometimes (clients) don't even realize they've been harmed."

Insurance reimbursement is an additional reason for the need for certification, Beer said. Many insurance companies will not reimburse clients for marriage and family therapy unless the therapist is licensed.

Many people then choose a social worker or psychologist who is licensed by the state, rather than someone specifically trained to work with marital and family problems, he said.

Rooney said in 1980 many occupational groups wanted to be licensed and were referred to the Kansas Credential Review Board. The review board recommends the credentialing of an occupational group.

She said the occupational group must provide several reasons for credentialing. The information includes health care costs, the availability to provide service, the effects on other health care personnel, recognition of standards for training and education, lack of other means to protect the public and proof of harm because of the lack of regulation.

The proof of harm must include written and consumer testimony of improper counseling.

FBI fails to discover evidence of marijuana use by Ginsburg

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The FBI failed in 143 interviews over four years to turn up evidence of marijuana use by Douglas H. Ginsburg, FBI Director William Sessions disclosed Monday.

For the final background check — which was to have been due Monday — the White House gave the FBI just one week instead of the usual 25 days after President Reagan nominated Ginsburg to the Supreme Court, the officials said.

Sessions, in his first extensive interview with reporters since he was sworn in Nov. 2, said that he will order a review of the FBI's background investigations into Ginsburg and that the results will be referred to the Justice Department for possible prosecution of anyone who might have lied to the agency.

Ginsburg's marijuana use in the 1960s and 1970s was first uncovered last week by the news media and led to his withdrawal from consideration for the nomination two days after he admitted using the illegal drug.

Speech, hearing clinic benefits from students

By Nancy Chartrand
Collegian Reporter

The Speech and Hearing Clinic offers assistance to area residents who have communication handicaps and gives audiology and speech pathology students a chance to gain valuable experience.

The clinic offers help to children and adults who have problems ranging from speech problems such as stuttering to hearing problems due to aging.

The students act as part of the team that helps treat people, said Peggy Nelson, program director and instructor of speech.

"I am doing exactly what I will be doing someday. It is a great experience," said Kathleen Gould, a senior in speech pathology who works at the clinic.

The clinic, located in Leasure Hall, has been in existence since the early 1960s. In order to work at the clinic, a student must have taken a clinical procedures class and have completed 25 hours of clinic observation.

The students also have a supervisor for each client that they have. Furthermore, students change clients every semester in order to work with a variety of clients.

"As students, we are getting good experience working with different clients."

—Renee Heimerman

The clinic is open to Manhattan residents and its services are free to all K-State students. Most clients are referred by Manhattan physicians, Gould said. An initial evaluation is made to determine what type of services can be provided.

"As students, we are getting good experience working with different clients," said Renee Heimerman senior in speech pathology.

In order for students to work in speech pathology or audiology they must receive a master's degree.

"(We) can't work with just a bachelor's degree," Heimerman said. "There is so much we need to know, that (we) have to get a master's degree."

"We assure people that our services are quality services," Nelson said. "We have a good record of success."

The clinic is financed from the fees that are generated from their services.

"We also have certain private donors," Nelson said. "One example is Sertoma, a men's service club." The clinic has offered hearing screenings at the Manhattan, Riley County and Union health fairs. The clinic also has worked with Manhattan's Head Start program.

Dancers' fluid movements pleasing to McCain patrons

By Tom McLaughlin
Collegian Reviewer

Pirouetting dancers graced McCain Auditorium Monday night as the State Ballet of Missouri whirled through Manhattan.

The ensemble of 28 dancers, formerly known as the Kansas City Ballet, treated a nearly full house with a number of ballets demonstrating the company's depth.

Ballet Review

"Meditation," an unscheduled dance, highlighted the evening's festivities. The dance, choreographed by Jacques D'Amboise, featured Louise Nadeau and Robert Skafte almost floating in subtle splashes of Joseph Appelt's earth-tone lights.

Skafte jetted around the subdued stage, becoming surprised when Nadeau entered dancing across the limpid pools of light in pointe-step. D'Amboise choreographed the piece so well that audience members felt like voyeurs interrupting the tender moment created by the two dancers.

The ensemble did a fine job accentuating comedic ballet. This perhaps could have been done more effectively without a canned music tape that had so much static on it that it sounded like someone had played Frisbee with the album.

Rossini's "Con Amore" dealt effectively with a hidden tribe of Amazons who are invaded by a comedic thief.

Costumes by Seppo Nurmina added the perfect touch to the militaristic Amazons. Swooping plumes, cavalier-style hats and olive green and gold jackets were visually appealing.

Disappointments of the evening included dancer Brian Stairh who leapt into his jete like he had just finished a seven-course meal.

In Balanchine's "Divertimento," once thought a lost ballet because all of the steps had been forgotten, Susan Manchak and Goddard Finley won the audience's appreciation with their great poise, composure, calmness and almost lyric steps. The sequence featured Francisco Renno as solo pianist, who for once in the evening gave the audience a break from the Stalag 13-like static. The dissonant style made this simple, yet wonderful, dance an elegant audience favorite.

All in all, with the exception of a few weak links in the ensemble, the State Ballet of Missouri left its footprint on Manhattan by presenting a visually and emotionally entertaining evening.

Parking spaces altered to daytime use

By Karen Allen
Collegian Reporter

K-State students and faculty members who dislike being late for class can save some time by using additional parking spaces recently made available for daytime use.

Twenty student-parking spaces south of Van Zile Hall and 10 faculty/staff parking spaces north of Anderson Hall have been converted from time-zone to all-day parking, said K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom.

On Petticoat Lane, from North Manhattan Avenue to the crosswalk south of Van Zile Hall, the 30-minute parking has been changed to student parking from 7 a.m. until 4 p.m., he said, adding that the 30-minute parking limit will still be in effect from 4 p.m. until 7 a.m.

"This area had been 30-minute parking for many years for visitors to the residence halls," Beckom said. "But it was not utilized in the daytime. The majority (of visitors) appear in the evening hours."

Residence hall permits will be invalid for use Monday through Friday between 7 a.m. and 4 p.m.

The spaces on Mid-Campus Drive north of Anderson Avenue have been changed from 30-minute parking to faculty/staff parking.

Vacancies in short-term parking during the day and requests for more reserved parking from faculty members were reasons for the change, Beckom said.

"It wasn't a question of taking students for a ride," he said, referring to the faculty/staff limitations placed on the Mid-Campus Drive spaces.

"The greatest amount of faculty spaces are in the Union lot and they were the majority of users and abusers in that area (Mid-Campus Drive)," Beckom said.

Signs were posted in both areas and, after issuing warnings for a week, officers are now giving out tickets, Beckom said.

The changes were implemented after studying the efficiency and effectiveness of the areas, Beckom said. Time-zone parking is abused too often, he said.

"We end up ticketing the same cars every day," Beckom said.

The circular drive at Nichols Hall still has 30-minute parking for people who need to run an errand, he said.

Plans are being worked on to further expand campus parking. "We are trying to get it to a livable condition," Beckom said.

Candidates debate funding plans

By Candice Leonard
Government Editor

Troy Lubbers said his biggest concern for the campus would be obtaining funding for Farrell Library, while Jack Taylor said he wants to coordinate curriculum evaluations with the accreditation process. The two candidates for student body president debated Tuesday during a UPC Issues and Ideas forum.

Lubbers, junior in marketing, proposed pushing for money from the second year of the "Margin of Excellence" plan to upgrade Farrell. Although the MOE plan lacks legislative approval, Lubbers said if it is passed, students need to lobby for inclusion of the library in K-State's allocation.

"The administration is not thinking (Farrell) is a student concern," he said. "Students need to make it a priority; the Margin of Excellence is the only real means of funding."
Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, suggested finding alumni support for the library.
He also outlined his new proposal for surveying K-State seniors and recent graduates to identify curriculum strengths and weaknesses.
"In this way, we can keep our curriculums on the cutting edge, and we wouldn't have to worry about losing accreditation," Taylor said.
Eva Chatterjee, junior in sociology and political science, pointed out the result may be more bureaucracy and paperwork.

Lubbers said he does not want to see selective admissions begin only at the University of Kansas, and Taylor said it is "something K-State shouldn't have at all."
Lubbers believes if only KU becomes selective, K-State may have the image of a second-rate institution among prospective students and regents members.
"We need to be very realistic, because everybody else is looking at selective admissions," Lubbers said. "The 10 percent window, proposed by the (Student Advisory Council), means we don't have to turn any students away."

Taylor remained in support of open admissions because of K-State's land-grant tradition.
"We owe it to every student to have the chance to excel in their chosen profession," Taylor said, stressing continuation of remedial classes. He used Provost James Coffman as an example of the differing needs of students, saying Coffman would have had difficulty meeting the proposed ACT requirement.
Taylor also wants to publicize the academic achievements and honors of current students.
"I don't think we have a second-rate problem," Taylor said. "People just need to know we're not second."

President hopes to curb dollar's decline in market

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, seeking to shore up the embattled U.S. dollar, declared Tuesday that the currency had fallen enough and that his administration is "not doing anything to bring it down."
Reagan's remarks, seeming to contradict recent suggestions by other officials that the administration would let the dollar fall, helped fuel a rebound in foreign exchange markets, where the dollar had plunged to new 40-year lows.
"I don't look for a further decline, don't want a further decline from where it is right now," Reagan told reporters in off-the-cuff remarks at the start of a meeting with visiting Israeli President Chaim Herzog.
A weaker dollar makes U.S. goods more competitive abroad but reduces Americans' purchasing power and standard of living. Too sharp a plunge can rekindle inflation and drive away foreign investments needed to finance the federal budget deficit.
Although Reagan's comments buoyed markets, at least temporarily, analysts suggested the remarks did not necessarily signal a shift in U.S. policy. They said the administration may have little choice but to accept further declines in the dollar, despite criticism from Europe and Japan.
The alternative is raising U.S. interest rates, a course neither the White House nor the Federal Reserve Board seemed likely to embrace, the analysts said.
Even as the president sought to bolster the dollar, his new commerce secretary, C. William Verity, said the markets should set the proper level for the dollar.
"We can do an awful lot of things and we probably will, but in the end it is the marketplace that will determine how far the dollar will fall if it will fall any further. And I happen to be a believer in markets," Verity said in a question session at the National Press Club after his first major speech as commerce secretary.

The dollar gained ground after Reagan's statement, rising to 134.15 Japanese yen in New York from 133.60 yen in earlier trading. The dollar closed in New York on Monday at 134.18 yen and fell in Tokyo on Tuesday to 133.65 yen, the first time it tumbled below the 134-yen level.
The Dow Jones industrial average, which lost nearly 60 points Monday, closed Tuesday down 22.05 points.
On the dollar, Reagan insisted: "We're not doing anything to bring it down," even though comments on the dollar last week by Treasury Secretary James A. Baker III — later endorsed by the White House — were blamed by traders for contributing to the recent fall.
Reagan said he had not discussed the situation with his financial advisers, and spokesman Marlin Fitzwater reiterated: "The president's comments were on his own."
But Fitzwater emphasized, "We are not seeking a lower level of the dollar."
The White House also issued a statement disavowing a New York Times report that said unidentified administration officials welcomed a weaker dollar. The story quoted one official as saying the administration wants the dollar to "drift, drift, drift."
"The unnamed White House and administration officials quoted in today's New York Times article on the dollar were not speaking for the administration," the statement said.

Schools must offer sex ed, board says

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Education has directed school districts to offer "comprehensive" sex education programs and information about AIDS to students beginning in September 1988.
The regulations, approved Monday on an 8-2 vote, put into effect a policy the board adopted in May.
The final version of the regulations give school boards wide latitude in developing programs acceptable to their communities. The school boards will decide the content of the programs; how and at what grade level the material will be offered and how much classroom time will be involved.
The programs will be required only at public schools. Any parent or guardian may ask that a student be excused from any part of the instruction.
The new set of regulations was opposed by Right to Life of Kansas Inc. "because it will end up increasing abortion and promiscuity," said the group's legislative lobbyist, Pat Goodson.
The board decided the programs should be "comprehensive," a decision that was hailed by a representative from the Kansas-National Education Association, the state's largest teacher organization.

Peg Dunlap, director of instructional advocacy for the association, said the decision to add the word "comprehensive" to the regulation told school boards that programs should be considerably more than just "a movie in the seventh grade over 45 minutes."
Without the expanded mandate, Dunlap said, it would have been easier for districts to offer limited programs. Now they will find it harder to ignore the new regulations, she said.
"It indicates that the state Board of Education sees this issue of human sexuality as something presented over time and that there are a variety of areas that make up human sexuality," Dunlap said.
The board earlier said it would ask the Legislature to provide $5 a student, or about $2 million next year, to help districts provide the instruction.
By Sept. 1, 1992, any teacher assigned to teach a human sexuality course must be certified by the state.

The results from the Student Governing Association general election survey last week showed a majority of the voters, Student Senate candidates and elected senators were students in greek living groups.
Nearly half of the voters identified themselves as belonging to a greek organization, the survey showed.
Sally Routson, director of student activities and Student Senate adviser, said it may be easier for candidates in greek houses to be elected.
"A large percentage of the involved upperclassmen are in greek houses," Routson said, adding that off-campus or residence hall candidates may have a more difficult time motivating students to vote for them.
Of the total greek membership on campus, 40.7 percent voted in the election, whereas only 12.4 percent of the total residence hall population and 6.3 percent of the off-campus students cast ballots.

Of the 82 official candidates for Student Senate, 49 were affiliated with a greek house, 18 were from residence halls and 15 lived off campus. Elected to the 1987-88 Student Senate were 31 greek affiliates, 13 off-campus and 4 residence hall students. The former Senate was composed of 32 greek affiliates, 11 off-campus students and 5 residence hall students.
Ironically, the top vote getter in the Senate election lives in a residence hall. Laurie Lawson, president of Ford Hall and sophomore in radio/television, attributed the voters she received to speaking at hall governing board meetings, effective advertising and asking people to vote for her.
"I'm involved in everything and know lots of people outside of the hall," Lawson said.

While Lawson comes from a living group of approximately 700, another living group of 113 will have eight members in the 1987-88 Student Senate.
These eight newly-elected senators are members of the Delta Delta Delta sorority.
"It might be nice to have better representation (instead of eight senators from one house)," Routson said. "But people in the house see how much fun it is to be in Senate and decide to run."
"It wasn't like we decided together (to run), everybody decided on their own," said Mary Gleissner, sophomore in business, newly-elected senator and member of Tri-Delta.
According to Eirene Tatham, senior in construction science and current senator, the high number of greek senators seemed to have an effect on the attitude of Senate.
"A majority of the people who didn't care seemed to be greek," Tatham said, adding they were

Poll closing time approved

WASHINGTON — The House, concerned that network projections of election winners discourage voter turnout in Western states, voted 208-189 Tuesday to require a simultaneous poll closing time of 9 p.m. EST in presidential general elections.

Both sides agreed that the standard poll closing, which applies to every state except Alaska and Hawaii beginning next year, won't work unless the major television networks honor their pledge not to project election results before the polls have closed.

Before the final vote, the House rejected, 305-99, a substitute plan by Rep. Bill McCollum, R-Fla., that would have forbidden local election officials to announce presidential results until 10 p.m. EST. His amendment was denounced as "censorship" and a "ridiculous, unworkable" proposal.

The bill's supporters argued that early projections of presidential election winners, based on "exit poll" interviews with voters leaving polling places, discourage voter turnout and may affect the outcome of state and local races, especially in the West.

"Over the last few decades, the integrity of Election Day has been eroded," said Rep. Al Swift, D-Wash., cosponsor of the bill with Rep. William M. Thomas, R-Calif. "Thousands of voters have been told that the election has been held without them, and that their votes don't count."

'Cheers' star talks about Long

RANDOR, Pa. — Ted Danson, who plays Sam the bartender on NBC's "Cheers," says he's tired of being asked about his feelings about his former co-star Shelley Long.

"I can't think of one thing about Shelley that wasn't negative. Of course, Shelley is difficult. But who cares? It's the work," he said in an interview in the Nov. 14 issue of TV Guide.

"Does her being difficult take away from your enjoying the Sam and Diane relationship? To talk about her now seems like being on my honeymoon talking about my ex-wife....Give me a break."

Comparing Long to new co-star Kirstie Alley, who plays Cheers' manager Rebecca Howe, Danson said: "Kirstie comes across as more vulnerable. And more relaxed. There was nothing relaxed about Shelley."

Rhea Perlman, who plays Carla, has similar impressions about Alley: "You immediately like her. She wants to be one of the guys. She doesn't care what she looks like; she's funky. She is totally different from Shelley — Shelley was never funky."

O'Neill in hospital for tests

BOSTON — Former House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill has been hospitalized for tests for "a long-neglected prostate problem," says his son.

Kip O'Neill said Tuesday that his father was admitted to a hospital Monday after "experiencing some pain and discomfort over the weekend."

The younger O'Neill, an attorney in Washington, refused to disclose where his father is being tested but said he should be released "in a day or two."

He said his father has suffered from a prostate problem for at least 10 years, but hadn't sought regular treatment for it.

New Navy duties await Prince

LONDON — Prince Andrew, a Royal Navy lieutenant who flew anti-submarine helicopters in the 1982 Falklands war, is to become a watch officer aboard a British destroyer next year, the Defense Ministry said Tuesday.

The son of Queen Elizabeth II will take up his new duties aboard HMS Edinburgh on May 10, 1988, the ministry said. The 27-year-old Duke of York, who joined the navy in 1979, currently is on shore duty as a helicopter warfare instructor.

USDA says pizza is not pizza

WEST HOLLYWOOD, Calif. — The Department of Agriculture is not impressed with trendy chef Wolfgang Puck's new frozen "haute cuisine" pizza. In fact, the federal agency said it isn't pizza.

The USDA's labeling division contended that Puck's product did not contain any tomato sauce, and until it does it can't be sold as pizza. The agency sets standards to ensure that consumers get what they expect.

"I think it's ridiculous that some bureaucrat in Washington thinks they are going to tell us what a pizza is," said Puck, owner of the celebrity haunt restaurant Spago. "Tomato sauce has a cheap image on pizza, and we decided to have fresh ingredients."

But he agreed to add tomato chunks to his basil-pesto sauce. He also agreed to change the label because the USDA complained that the "country sausage" on his pizza was not made in the country at all, but in the industrial City of Commerce.

Court reviews death sentence

BANGUI, Central African Republic — The Supreme Court said it will begin Saturday to hear the appeal of the death sentence imposed on the nation's former ruler, Jean-Bedel Bokassa.

Bokassa was sentenced to death June 12 following conviction on charges of committing murder, arbitrary arrest and embezzlement during his 14-year dictatorship, which ended in 1979.

No date has been set for the execution, pending the court's decision on the appeal.

Korea progressing politically

LAWRENCE — Although political transformation in South Korea has not been smooth, the country's ambassador to the United States says the nation is continuing its march toward progress.

"I think, on the whole, we are going to be able to make it," said Kyung-Won Kim, who has been U.S. ambassador since 1985. "Of course, I don't guarantee the process is going to be a smooth one."

Kim was the keynote speaker Monday night for "Korea 1988: A Nation at the Crossroads." The symposium is sponsored by the University of Kansas' Center for East Asian Studies.

In an appearance before about 100 people, Kim described South Korea as an awakening economic giant. He said the small East Asian nation also is attempting to become a viable democracy.

Presidential elections scheduled for next month are a result of demonstrations and rioting by students and workers this past summer.

Dean presents 'thoughts'

Isenhour reflects upon life

By Sally Neary
Collegian Reporter

"My life has been a scattered series of events with no single theme; therefore, I will present to you a scattered collection of my thoughts."

Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, did just that Tuesday evening when he presented his lecture in the Union as part of the Last Lecture Series sponsored by Union Program Council.

Isenhour began by reflecting on his thoughts about profound questions. He remembered a time when his 5-year-old daughter stapled her finger.

"Theologians and philosophers have the history of arguing the issue of why bad can happen in a universe controlled by an all-powerful God who is good. Me, I have trouble just understanding why every small child has to staple their finger," Isenhour said.

Isenhour discussed his ideas for spring 1988.

"Of all the things you can count on (one) is that the mountains are still there on a foggy day," he said. "Another thing you can count on is the flowers will bloom next spring."

He said he believes even if the world has a nuclear war which annihilates the human race, flowers will still bloom the next spring.

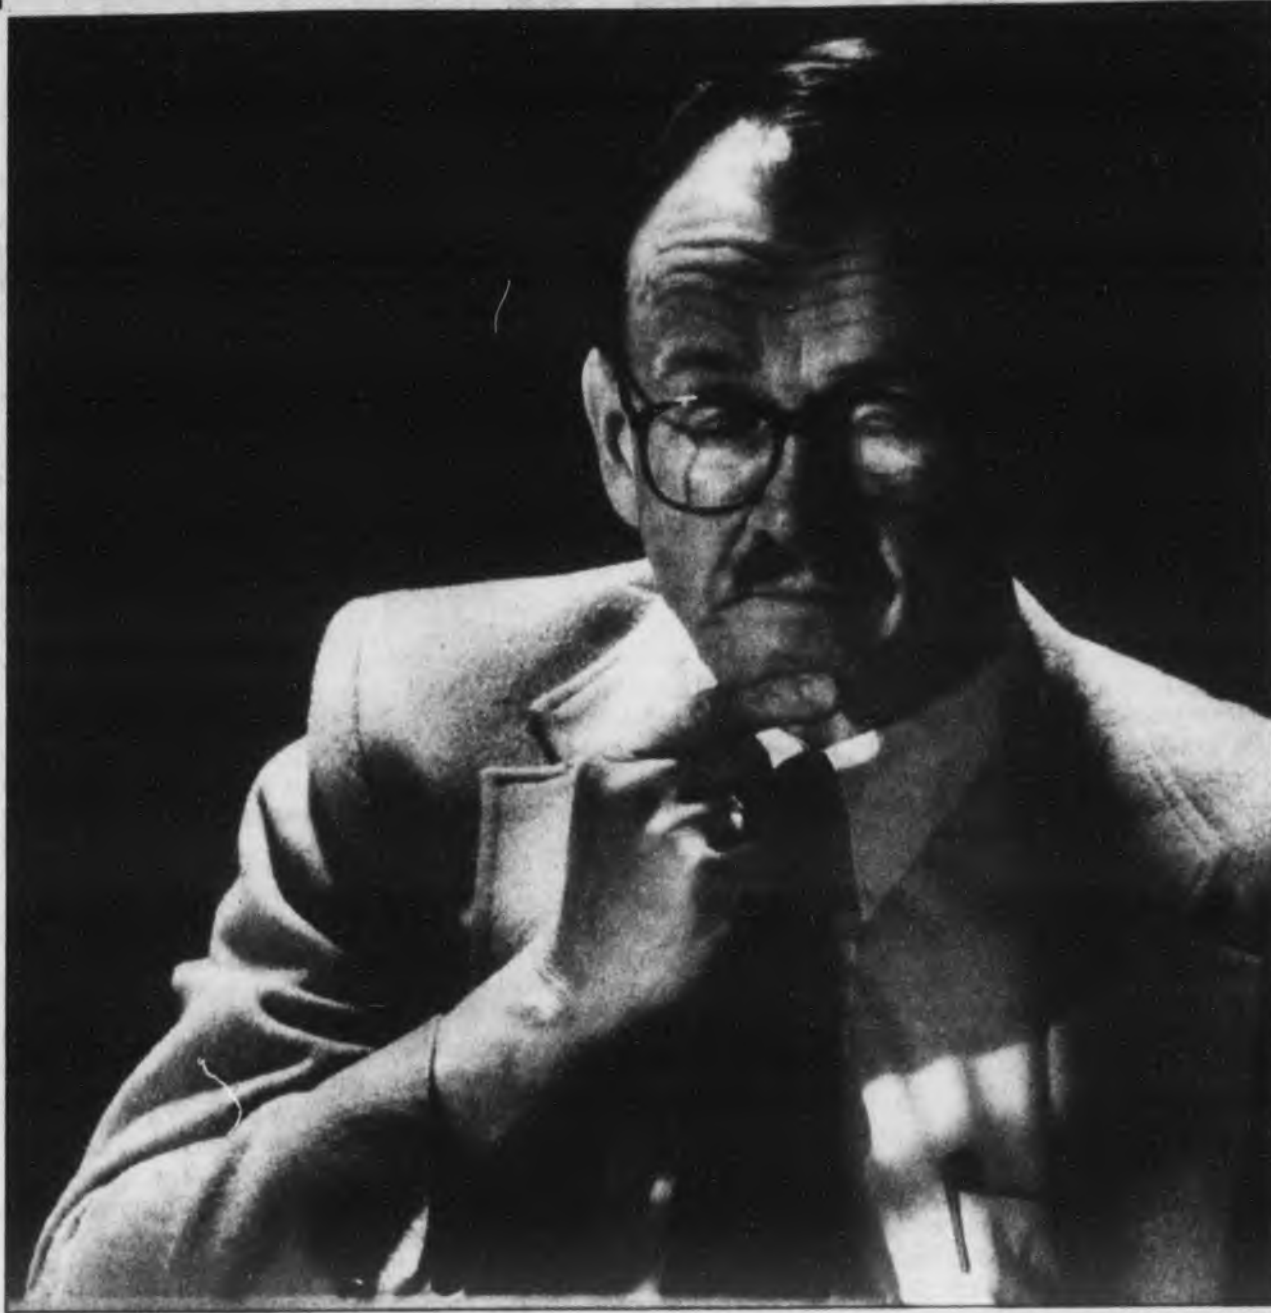

"Nature doesn't really seem to care what we do to ourselves," he said.

Isenhour said the present is the future of the past.

"The past cannot be changed, the present is where we are and the future is where we make it," he said.

He said not to confuse the past self with the present self.

"If you've been learning and growing, your present self should be quite different from your past self," he said.

Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences Thomas Isenhour speaks on what he calls "a scattered collection of my thoughts," at the Union Program Council's Last Lecture Series Tuesday night in the Catskeller.

He said one should learn from the mistakes of the past self, and use them to make a better future self.

Isenhour said, sarcastically, he used to think college students were intelligent, but a few years on a campus can provide some bizarre quotes from students.

"By the way, none of these quotes come from K-State," he said.

He quoted a pre-med student who had gotten a question wrong on a test because he had named three organic acids of increasing strengths backwards. He quoted the student saying, "I got the one in the middle right, so I should get one-third credit."

On love and understanding, Isenhour said, "It is really important to be understood by someone who loves you. That is a very different thing than being loved by someone who understands you."

Isenhour asked, "Is the deep desire to believe in religion just another wish to be loved by someone, God in this case, who understands you?"

Also, he said most people have difficulty expressing themselves on basic issues.

"It is very hard to express one's self to others if you haven't expressed your own thoughts to yourself."

"Until you spend a lot of time in self-inspection on major issues of your whole life, you will probably find it difficult to communicate to others on important issues."

Transplant center demands payment

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — The world's leading transplant center demanded Tuesday that a woman pay $261,189 owed for the care of her son, whose fight for life through three liver transplants drew contributions from President Reagan and other people around the country.

"We have every reason to believe that there were funds left over to pay the balance and if there were not, she needed to talk to us about the situation," said

Edwin K. Zechman Jr., president of Children's Hospital of Pittsburgh.

But Maria DeSillers of Miami insists she won't pay the hospital the balance of the $424,302 bill until she's told why her only child "went from the perfect transplant candidate to ending up the way he did."

Ronnie DeSillers, 7, died April 29 awaiting his fourth liver transplant.

"If I had to do it over again, I probably would not take him there," DeSillers said.

Improved auto safety a concern for everyone

When people think of fatal car crashes they normally think of the drivers who "were going too fast" or "didn't know how to drive." They think of speed, drunken driving or inexperience as major factors in traffic fatalities. But a recent study shows drivers and passengers might not even be safe at slow speeds.

Every year the U.S. government conducts tests to judge how safe passenger cars, light pickups and vans are in 35 mph collisions. Results from this year show that drivers and front-seat passengers in almost half the vehicles tested, 18 out of 38, would receive a fatal or very severe head injury in a 35 mph crash. Small trucks and vans were even more dangerous to riders as eight of 12 tested would produce the same amount of injury in the same crashes. What is even more frightening is these tests were conducted using the rider restraint devices required in the vehicles.

These tests show people would not have to leave the Manhattan city limits to be killed in a traffic accident. They could be driving along Clafin Avenue, 11th Street or the Southern Arterial and be in danger.

What has happened over the years is the federal government has bowed to pressure from automobile manufacturers to relax safety standards, in a misguided effort to make the cars cheaper to build. They have put a price on safety and human lives. One example of this is the relaxation of crash standards for passenger car bumpers. The standard has been slashed in half, from 5 mph to 2.5 mph — or about the speed of an average walking pace. The standard says a bumper should be able to withstand a 2.5 mph impact without substantial damage to the front of the car.

Relaxation of standards is a fine practice as long as people are not put in undue danger when they drive or ride in the vehicles. However, relaxation of standards through lobbying pressure has managed to eliminate air bags, relaxed roof collapse standards and resulted in a virtual absence of safety regulations for pickups.

These latest tests only go to show efforts to cut costs might also be cutting lives short as well. It is time car owners begin exerting pressure on the car companies to make vehicles safer for all concerned — and the best way to do this is by buying the vehicles that provide the greatest protection.

Students need to vote today during elections

Vote.

There's really nothing to it. Go to the Union — or, for those in Veterinary medicine, go to the Veterinary Medicine Complex — with a piece of identification, pick up a ballot, mark it, and feel secure in the knowledge that you have helped direct the future of K-State.

With the dimly poor voter percentage last week, though, we cannot afford another low turnout.

Remember: the student body president speaks for the students, lobbying for their needs, and informing the regents of their dislikes — including higher tuition.

So if you don't vote, don't complain about future events. You haven't earned the right.

Stealing from within deserves more attention from companies

As the Christmas season approaches, we can expect the usual publicity campaign by local and national retail merchants, warning us that they are gearing up for the army of shoplifters they expect to descend upon them like a hoard of locusts. We, the shoppers, who are the target of their stern pronouncements, can expect to see fresh signs at their doors saying, "We prosecute shoplifters." And there will undoubtedly be an article in the newspaper, somehow strangely inspired by the Christmas spirit, about the terrible cost of shoplifting and how it must be passed on to the honest shopper.

Seldom, if ever locally, is the subject of employee theft discussed, or shoplifting losses compared to those resulting from light-fingered employees. My personal knowledge comes partly from an uncle, who worked part time as a store detective in Minneapolis, Minn. Working only four hours per day, he averaged one arrest per shift, 85 percent of which were employees of the actual businesses he was surveilling.

Just in time for the holidays, we now have some national statistics to look at. In the most recent survey by Arthur Young & Co., a New York accounting firm, 120 companies with revenues of $110 billion reported that 42 percent of their theft losses were caused by employees and 31 percent because of shoplifting. The rest, 27 percent, involved paperwork or vendor errors. The total loss was $1.3 billion, or 1.2 percent of sales. My guess is that employee theft is responsible for an even larger slice of the pie, noting how business losses may be attributed to outside shoplifters for, if nothing else, lack of a better scapegoat.

Getting to the real magnitude of this problem, the Upper Midwest Mutual Association, a retail group headquartered in Minnesota, said the average theft by an employee this year amounts to $1,077.15.

"I think we just have to be more vigilant with all of our employees, including our loss prevention staff," said Gene Williams, area asset protection manager for the Minneapolis-based Target Stores. This was after a part-time employee and the vice president of the security firm contracted to guard Target warehouses had been nailed for walking off with an estimated $20,000 in merchandise!

Donaldson's, another Minneapolis department store, instituted a program that followed industry trends by offering cash "bonuses" to employees who rat on their fellow workers. After two years, Donaldson's has termed the program a success, even though they still attribute 55 percent of their "shrinkage" to employee theft. Their largest case, discovered just six months ago, uncovered one employee who had pilfered $40,000 worth of goodies.

Commentary

JUDD ANNIS
Collegian Columnist

I doubt that the average shopper in Manhattan is much more honest or dishonest than the average merchant. Why, then, do store owners feel so free to insult their customers by implying that each and every one is a potential shoplifter, and that they will be under surveillance every minute they are in the store? Maybe the increased competition of the mall will jar the attitudes of the older, more established merchants, but I wouldn't be too optimistic.

Coming from several years experience in retail sales, I know the stores with class treat you like a guest in their home. Sure, the surveillance is still there, but you aren't aware of it. Sensitive store owners know and understand what makes customers mad, and they take great pains not to do that.

Why then should we, as potential purchasers of a product, be found "potentially guilty" before we even put our foot in the door. True, Christmas may well be "big rip-off time" for store owners, but it's also "beaucoup cash flow time," too. While we're out there spending our hard earned dollars (or pennies in most cases), let's demand a little respect from those whose pockets we're lining. At the same time, let's also take a closer look at where the real problem lies.

Open admissions important to Kansas

I am aware that when many of you skim through the first couple of paragraphs of my column and realize that I'm not cracking any of my corny jokes — but talking about something serious instead — you will head straight for "Bloom County" and the personals. I understand completely. But I would ask that just this one time you try to muddle through the entire column before turning to the crossword, because this is something that should hit home with a great many of you.

I'm talking about the possibility of you not being here at K-State right now. It's the possibility that your little brother or little sister might be denied the right to attend K-State in a year or two. And if you happen to be living in Kansas in 20 years or so, it's the possibility that your children may not be allowed to attend the state university of their choice. It's just about to happen.

Several weeks ago I outlined the selective admissions proposal currently before the Board of Regents and gave my opinions of it. If you're as opposed to the entire concept of selective admissions as I am (and judging from the feedback I've received, I suspect most of you are), I want to help you do something about it.

It's going to be easy. All you have to do is write a couple of quick letters to a couple of key groups. It's time to be heard on this. It will take a total of about 10 minutes out of your day. Heck, you can even write them during that 9:30 lecture you're usually dozing off in or during one of those annoying one-hour gaps between classes. Ten minutes. That's it. One of the most important letters you can write is to your hometown board of education. Or even better, write one to each school board member, or to one or two that you know personally. We need to let these people know that the regents' proposals are going to have adverse effects on their schools and their students — college-bound or not, and put an extreme financial burden on their district. We can encourage them to publicly oppose the policy. It's not unrealistic at all. Here's a sample letter:

Make yourself heard with a letter

"Dear Board of Education Member:
"I am part of a group of students at Kansas State University who are very concerned about the recent proposal brought before the Board of Regents regarding a selective admissions policy for Kansas' public universities. We believe this proposal to be unjustifiable, and feel it will cause several problems not only on the state and university level, but on the local level as well.

"One aspect of the proposal would require a student to have completed a specified high school curriculum with a minimum grade point average. Providing several of the specified courses, including foreign languages, computer science, history or appreciation of art or music, three different social studies courses, and three different natural science courses, in a quantity and quality to satisfy the needs of the school's college-bound students could cause a financial strain on many school budgets. This could also lead to de-

Commentary

DOUG FOLK

emphasizing and/or eliminating several vocational and agricultural courses which are vital not only to the college-bound student, but to students who will not seek further education after high school. Because this aspect of the proposal contains no provisions to ensure that high schools do not suffer financially, we feel it is unacceptable.

"Other aspects of the proposed policy include a minimum ACT score or admitting those ranking in the top one-third of their graduating class. We believe these to be overly restrictive and not always indicative of a student's performance in college.

"Very little will actually be gained by the implementation of these proposals, while much will be lost. The best way to approach the problem of unprepared college students, in our opinion, is to help high schools improve their courses and curricula. We urge you to read through the regents' proposal, study its implications, and inform the Board of Regents, the Kansas Legislature and Gov. Mike Hayden that you oppose the policy and support the continuance of the current open admissions policy and increased support for the improvement of high school programs in the state.

"Sincerely,
"Joe Student
"Kansas State University student and USD xxx resident"

This is just a sample letter. Of course, you should put your own words into it. Feel free, however, to plagiarize my words as well. I promise not to sue. But write something. In an article in the Topeka Capital-Journal, Robert L. DeBruyn, author and publisher of the weekly publication The Master Teacher, says this: "To my surprise, neither parents, educators, interest groups, nor the general public seem to find any need to march on the Capitol to stop such legislation which would end an opportunity for some of their children. We should. These people should be joined by every elementary teacher and college professor in the state to halt such action. Every principal, superintendent and board of education in Kansas should lead the charge against such a move — as should every civic group, radio station and newspaper in our 105 counties."

I believe we can get these people to charge if we just give them a little nudge. Some other groups to write your letters to include local high school administrators, local newspapers, your legislators, Hayden and the Board of Regents. If you don't know who your state legislators are, come to the Associated Students of Kansas office in the Union and you can find out. Also, ASK will mail any letters to legislators or regents for you. See, I told you this was going to be easy.

Marc S. Tucker, writing for the Los Angeles Times-Washington Post service, said, "A few years ago, when a government commission proclaimed 'a rising tide of mediocrity' in the nation's schools, college faculties were quick to join the chorus of criticism. Angry at the poor preparation of entering freshmen, they quickly responded to the new mood by getting tough, raising standards for admission. And they washed their hands of the problem. But they have had no more success than Lady Macbeth..." Let's take advantage of the fact that we're usually a couple of years behind the coastal trends and learn from their mistakes. Few of their problems have been solved.

If we want to prevent this strangulation of opportunity in our state, we have to do it now. The proposal will be discussed at next week's Board of Regents meeting, and it could possibly be approved in December. It would then go to the 1988 Legislature for approval. Many people are telling you that it's bound to go through, and all we can do is try to water it down. Don't you believe it! If the citizens of this state don't want selective admissions, they can stop it. We have the opportunity to help their voices be heard.

Veterans Day activities include campus ceremony

By Jan Schwartz
Collegian Reporter

Several activities are planned to commemorate Veterans Day in order "to honor veterans of all wars — past and present," said Army Sgt. Maj. Thomas Guillory.

A command retreat ceremony on campus will be performed by cadets from the Army and Air Force ROTC programs, and a fund-raising event at Triangle Park will be sponsored by the KSU Memorial Committee and KQLA-FM, said Bill Arck, adviser to the KSU Vietnam Memorial Committee.

Guillory said at 7:30 a.m. wreaths will be placed in the Military Science Building, the All Faiths Chapel and on first floor of the Union beside the plaque dedicated to the memory of K-Staters who gave their lives in the Vietnam war.

The Arnold Air Society, an organization of Air Force ROTC cadets, has also designated this week as POW-MIA Awareness Week in conjunction with Veterans Day, said

John Taglieri, assistant professor of aerospace studies. POWs and MIAs are prisoners of war and those missing in action.

The Society will be collecting donations to help build the $20,000 K-State Vietnam Memorial dedicated to the K-State students who died in the war, Arck said. The collecting of donations, called Operation Combat Boot, will be from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. and 4-6 p.m. at Triangle Park in Aggieville.

"As money and time permit, we'll start building the memorial," Arck said. "A similar event held the day of the K-State-Army football game raised about $1,900."

At 5 p.m. today, more than 200 Army and Air Force ROTC cadets will present a command retreat ceremony on the lawn east of Anderson Hall, Guillory said.

The two departments take turns presiding over the ceremony, Taglieri said. This year Army cadet Lt. Col. Martin Dannatt will be the commander of troops.

An information table will be set up in the Union today as part of the POW-MIA Awareness Week, he said. People can sign a petition to show their support to gain the release of the POW-MIAs or information containing where the POW-MIAs are.

"The petition will be sent to the Vietnam government," Taglieri said. "Officially Congress is still trying to negotiate the release of POWs. It's believed they are being held in camps in Cambodia or Laos."

A balloon release Monday at the Union kicked off the POW-MIA Awareness Week. The Arnold Air Society distributed free literature in the Union explaining what POW-MIA is all about, he said.

Tuesday, members of the honor society sold identification bracelets for the National League of Families. Each bracelet is inscribed with a name of one of the POWs or MIAs that has not been accounted for, Taglieri said. The National League of Families is a support group for people who have family members who are POWs or MIAs.

Government payments in '86 increase farmers' net income

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A dramatic increase in government payments to Kansas farmers kept the state's total farm income from decreasing last year and increased net farm income, Kansas Agricultural Statistics reported this week.

In its latest report, dated Monday, the agency said that Kansas farmers saw their sales revenues decrease significantly but saw net income increase "due largely" to an 80.7 percent increase in government payments.

According to the report, farmers made $5.42 billion from the sale of their products in 1986, compared with $5.88 billion in 1985, a 7.8 percent decrease.

However, government payments to Kansas farmers increased by $389 million in 1986 compared to 1985, or from $482 million to $871 million. Without the increase, net farm income would have decreased about 5 percent.

Instead, net farm income increased 28.6 percent, from $1.15 billion in 1985 to $1.47 billion in 1986. Also, farm production expenses decreased 5.3 percent, from $5.83 billion in 1985 to $5.51 billion in 1986, the report said.

Non-cash income increased by 23.2 percent, from $280 million in 1985 to $345 million in 1986, and gross farm income by two-tenths of one percent, from $6.97 billion to $6.99 percent.

The agency also reported that cooler and mostly dry weather prevailed in most of the state during most of October, allowing good progress in the harvesting of some crops but creating concerns for wheat farmers.

At the beginning of October, 34 percent of the state's topsoil was rated as short of moisture, the report said. At the end of the month, 54 percent was considered short.

"Most of the shortage existed in western and south-central Kansas," the report said. "Producers in these areas were concerned about getting wheat emerged and establishing good stands before winter dormancy set in."

By Nov. 1, the agency said, the soybean harvest was 90 percent complete, compared to the average for the date, 60 percent. Ninety-seven percent of the corn harvest was completed, compared to the average of 80 percent, and 75 percent of the sorghum harvest was finished, compared to the average of 55 percent.

In parts of southern Kansas, the harvesting lagged behind the other parts of the state, the report said, because of wet conditions.

The agency's projections for production of some crops in November were mixed.

Sorghum production is expected to be 270.1 million bushels, down 3 percent from projections for October and 13 percent from 1986's record crop.

Corn production is also expected to decrease 4 percent from October's projected level and 17 percent compared to 1986, to 150 million bushels. Also, the amount of acres harvested for grain dropped 10 percent compared to 1986, to 1.2 million acres.

Yields are also expected to be down 5 bushels an acre from October's yield and 11 bushels per acre from last year's, at 125 bushels per acre.

However, soybean production is expected to increase 6 percent in November, compared to October, to 69.3 million bushels. That figure would represent a 19 percent increase over last year's production for the month.

Zoning proposals heard

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan City Commissioners, Tuesday, discussed two proposed zoning changes from the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board which would affect the areas surrounding the K-State campus.

The first proposal requires hearings with the Board of Zoning Appeals before new apartment buildings, fraternities or sororities could be built in the University Overlay District, according to Larry Hulse, director of community development.

The University Overlay District is an area one block deep which surrounds the campus, Hulse said.

Residents in the area would be informed of any hearings on planned new developments in the district, Hulse said, and would have the opportunity to state their opinions about these changes.

Hulse said he was concerned because property owners view apartment buildings or fraternities in the neighborhood as driving down the property value.

In the second proposal, zoning rules in the area south of Anderson Avenue, east of Manhattan Avenue and north of Poyntz Avenue would be changed to emphasize more single family houses.

Some prospective home owners may have purchased houses in other areas, Hulse said, because the zoning in this area currently allows for construction of apartment buildings.

Report checks flight arrivals

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — One in every four flights by the major carriers arrived 15 minutes late in September and 150 flights were chronically so, arriving tardy more than 80 percent of the time, the government reported Tuesday.

The airlines' on-time report card was issued by the Transportation Department in the first set of monthly statistics aimed at helping travelers choose airlines with the best service.

American Airlines had the best on-time arrival record in September while USAir was the tardiest among 14 carriers listed by the report, based on statistics supplied by the airlines themselves.

One-third of the chronically late arrivals belong to Delta Air Lines, the department said.

While the department report provided consumer information on tens of thousands of flights, critics called the information incomplete because it failed to include delays caused by mechanical errors and because the on-time information did not focus on specific flights.

Furthermore, some information on delays at specific airports, based on passenger volume, covered only 27 major airports, excluding such cities as Cincinnati, Kansas City, Indianapolis and New Orleans, all of which have major aviation activity.

"If you want to fly from city to city and you have two airlines, you want to know how they related on specific flights," said Jack Corbett.

Architecture series continues

K-State's "Architecture from the Plains," a year-long series of exhibits and presentations by leading architectural firms in the region, continues this week with a show by Da Roza Architects from Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Today, Gustavo Da Roza will discuss the design concepts and processes which gave form to a diverse group of projects his firm has designed. His talk is scheduled for 8 p.m. in the Big 8 Room at the Union.

Professor of Architecture Eugene Kremer said Da Roza Architects offers architectural services as well as consultation in planning, programming, interior and furniture design, and art installation.

Business college wins award

K-State's College of Business has received a $1,000 award from Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal, to commemorate its participation in the Newspaper-in-Education program.

The University is one of only 25 colleges in the nation to receive the award.

K-State was one of the original schools in the 40-year-old program and its business faculty continue to participate in the program.

Society recognizes alumnus

Ivan Strickler received the 1987 distinguished alumnus award of the K-State chapter of Gamma Delta Sigma, an international honor society of agriculture, Monday.

Strickler has been active in many county, state and national agricultural organizations. He has served as president of the Mid-Am Southern Division Corporate Board and was appointed to the National Dairy Promotion and Research Board and elected chairman. He has also served as a board member and president of the National Holstein Association.

Faculty Senate: More discussion needed for selective admissions

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Collegian Reporter

Senators passed resolutions at Tuesday's Faculty Senate meeting expressing their concern about any hastiness by the Board of Regents in implementing the recommended selective admissions policy. In addition, Faculty Senate also stated its opposition to the impending changes in health insurance benefits of state employees.

The resolution on selective admissions stated the Faculty Senate's "concern about the wisdom of imposing selective admissions at any university without further dialogue between all regents institutions and the board."

The resolution also asked the Board of Regents to discuss and examine with the faculty of all regents institutions the effects of the policy on those institutions.

Some of the concerns expressly stated included the effects of the proposed admissions policy on the number of minorities and students from small or rural high schools who may not be admitted, the overall effect on student enrollment numbers and the cost to the universities of screening applicants.

The resolution on impending changes in health insurance benefits stated that both the Faculty Senate and the faculty of K-State "strongly oppose" the changes in health insurance coverage.

The Faculty Senate also urged University President Jon Wefald and the Board of Regents to intervene in the state government on the behalf of the faculty.

In ruling on other old business, the Senate adopted the recommended policies on "Integrity in Research and Scholarly Activity" and "Recruitment and Selection Procedures for Unclassified Positions" with minor revisions.

The Senate voted down a proposed change in University policy on student evaluations.

The change would have required faculty members to evaluate their peers on teaching competence if student ratings were used to evaluate a member of a department's or division's faculty.

In new business, the Faculty Senate conducted a straw vote on a resolution "to communicate to the president and the provost of the University our concerns about administrative changes in the provost's office and the graduate school currently under consideration."

Faculty Senate held a moment of silence in the memory of Stella Harris, a chemistry professor at K-State for 36 years. Harris retired in 1953 and was granted emeritus rank at the time of her retirement. She died Oct. 22 at the age of 103.

FDIC repays money to area depositors

By The Associated Press

MAZEPPA, Minn. — The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. is repaying money to Missouri and Kansas depositors and others who lost money when funds sent to the former Peoples State Bank here were diverted.

The bank was declared bankrupt in August. The Commerce Bank of Kansas City, acting on behalf of 14 other banks, had wired $1.4 million for deposit to the bank. The status of the money, as well as $5.3 million from other sources, was in doubt because it had never actually been deposited at the time of the bankruptcy.

The FDIC concluded that the money constituted deposits because the funds were solicited by the bank and forwarded according to the bank's instructions, said Alan Whitney, an FDIC spokesman in Washington.

The procedure is common. Banks frequently wire their excess deposits to other banks that need deposits and are willing to pay for them.

The bank failed and was closed

Aug. 21.

Depositors have been paid for most of the $6.7 million that was wired to the Mazeppa bank but never arrived there, said Paul Jeddell, an FDIC attorney at its Burnsville office. The few depositors who haven't been paid have not yet completed their claims, he said.

Minnesota investigators said a partial list of the 14 Missouri and Kansas banks involved included Bannister Bank & Trust of Kansas City; the Commercial Bank of Liberty; the First National Bank of Phillipsburg, Kan.; the First State Bank of Norton; and the State Bank of Colwich.

Authorities allege that the funds were diverted by 26-year-old businessman Daniel K. Conners, the bank's owner, to accounts elsewhere controlled by him and his other companies.

Whitney said the FDIC has not decided whether to try to recover the funds from Conners or the bank's other officers and directors. Investigations of bank failures usually take several months to complete.

Your diet's catch of the day

Last year, calcium hit it big. Then fiber became a dietary concern. Now, fish oil is bobbing its way into becoming the newest health kick.

Much public attention has been focused on fish and fish oil in the diet, based on the observation that groups of people that regularly eat fish have lower rates of heart disease.

The link between fish oil and reduced heart disease was first noticed by Danish scientists who discovered that the Eskimos of Greenland virtually never die of heart disease. After investigating, the scientists concluded a high fish diet was the Eskimos' chief weapon against an early death.

Fish are particularly rich in Omega-3 fatty acids, a form of polyunsaturated fat that is chemically different from the Omega-6 fatty acids found in vegetable oils.

Omega-3 fats help lower blood cholesterol levels and reduce a risk factor for heart disease.

All this talk about fish oil and heart disease has lead to an increased consumption of fish oil capsules by consumers.

More than half a dozen companies are putting fish oils in gelatin capsules, that look like Vitamin E supplements, and selling them at about 20 cents a capsule.

Consumers are being led to believe that large amounts of fish oil can reduce the risk of a heart attack, but considering current health information, the benefit of fish oil has not been proven.

Although fish oil and Omega-3 fatty acids in fish do lower levels of certain fats in the blood, their association with heart disease is not clearly established.

Too much fish oil in a diet can interfere with the ability of blood to clot and to form protection against prolonged bleeding or hemorrhaging. Excessive bleeding is a potential risk when large amounts of fish oil are taken into the body.

Another important fact about consuming fish oil pills is calories. Every gram of fat contains 9 calories, so if you take 10 grams of fish oil daily, you are gaining 90 calories. And if a people buy cod liver oil instead of capsules made from fish flesh, they will be consuming some cholesterol, as well as Vitamins A and D.

The problem with some types of fish is their fat content. The fattier fish types contain more oil, which means more flavor, but also, more calories.

Catfish, cod, flounder and snapper are good selections for a lean fish.

Bluefish, mackerel, salmon and tuna are fatty fish and contain more fish oil.

The question is: Can one know the correct amount of fish oil to add to one's diet?

The American Heart Association recommends the regular consumption of fish, but it does not recommend taking fish oil capsules as a dietary supplement.

The American Heart Association dietary guidelines for adults suggest no more than 5 to 7 ounces of fish, poultry or lean meat per day.

The bottom line: In all likelihood there is no harm in taking fish oil capsules, and there are perhaps some benefits in taking the supplements — especially if a person does not eat lots of fatty, cold-water fish, like salmon or sardines.

For now, Americans are advised that fish oil capsules are not a cure for heart disease.

A healthy lifestyle and a balanced diet are the best answers to decreasing the risks of heart disease.

These fish marinades can be used to flavor any type of fish. They are lower in calories and more tasty than broiling in butter.

Marinades

Spicy Yogurt Marinade

This combination of flavors is best suited for fatty fish such as mackerel and bluefish. The yogurt makes it most appropriate for baking or broiling.

Reliving Grandpa's memories and Grandma's remedies

Grandparents. Aren't they great? Isn't it strange how as a child growing up, the trips to your grandparents' were always the most memorable?

At this time of year we think of our grandparents often. (Mine usually call about this time of year wanting to know what I want for Christmas.) We tell them, then act really surprised when we unwrap exactly what we told them. It's great.

At this time I also think of the drive to Grandma and Grandpa's: the endless car ride and anticipation of getting there and entering a different world. The world of grandparents.

Something about the era they grew up in always fascinated me. The stories they told seem so mysterious and ancient, yet so life-like that you saw yourself playing side-by-side with them.

Food for Thought

SUSAN STAGGENBORG Feature
Editor

I always thought my life was so hurried and busy compared to their childhood. But they always told of the hard work they did "when I was your age," and somehow that hard work didn't seem so bad. At least not as bad as cleaning up my room.

The simple things in life are important to them — even more so when they were growing up. Our lives as children were more complicated and more material than our grandparents. It was easy as a child to want far more than you could have; when the world threw radio-controlled cars and high-tech games at you.

It was always nice to arrive at their house. The scene will always be the same in my memory: Grandpa holding the door open and Grandma rushing out to greet us, beaming with a smile all the way. While laying a kiss on my cheek, I notice the familiar scent of Grandma's sweet aroma of freshly baked pies, and Grandpa smelling like his musky shaving soap as I wrap my arms about his neck.

Their house is an escape for me. A journey into the past. Old furniture and pictures are their memories of a day gone by and my glimpse into bygone days.

Every grandparent's home smells the same. Like dusty mothballs. The kitchen will always smell like freshly baked bread and pies with a hint of cinnamon — even when nothing is baking. The warmth of the kitchen invites conversation, where much of the "catching up" takes place in our family.

Many of us will be traveling to our Grandparents' this upcoming holiday, but if not, take a moment and travel back to when you were younger and the memories you shared with your grandparents. And thank them for the times you've shared. It's what the holidays are all about.

Practical Pointers

These hints are some of the ones which Grandmas probably lived by.

Bothered by bad breath? Try rubbing your gums with a piece of wool coated with honey. Find a sheep willing to give you some wool, and your problems will be solved.

Listen up, sickly students. Grandma says to eat a roasted onion before you go to bed and it will help cure your cold.

Headache? Try these two headache remedies: Make a paste from grated, uncooked potato and put it on your forehead. If you have a migraine, swallow a tablespoon of honey.

One final hint from Grandma for those who suffer from leg cramps. Rub a clove of garlic on your foot before retiring to prevent leg cramps at night.

60,000 Soviets to be fired

Campaign cuts half of ministry jobs

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — A national newspaper disclosed Tuesday that 60,000 Moscow residents will be fired in the next two years under Soviet General Secretary Mikhail S. Gorbachev's campaign to streamline government by cutting 50 percent of all ministry jobs.

The newspaper Socialist Industry said the order to eliminate every second government job by the year 1990 has resulted in turmoil in the Moscow-based ministries, with fearful employees lined up to appeal their firing orders.

The report raised the usually taboo subject of unemployment in the Soviet Union, although it never referred to the "reassigned" workers as unemployed.

It portrayed the firings and the disruptions they were causing for Soviet workers as necessary sacrifices in Gorbachev's campaign for "perestroika," or wholesale restructuring of the economy and society.

Socialist Industry said the criteria used by ministry administrators, labor union officials and Communist Party leaders to decide who goes.

"There will probably be mistakes and miscalculations made."

—The newspaper Socialist Industry

The newspaper said influential people were able to trade unattractive reassignments for better posts, or escape the cuts altogether by using their connections.

"Let others go," the newspaper quoted one woman, identified only as Nadezhda P., as saying, "I've been offered a 180-ruble job in the place of my 220-ruble job, and I won't go."

The proposed reassignment would drop her salary from the equivalent of $355 to $290 at the official rate of exchange.

The woman argued that her seniority should ensure her the right to retain her job.

A.N. Lazarev, deputy chief of the newly merged ministry of machine-building for heavy, energy and transport industries, told the newspaper that 680 people in the combined ministry had already been laid off.

He said the criteria used to decide who is fired are efficiency, education and then age, family situation and "moral quality."

A panel has been created within the new ministry to hear appeals from those who feel they have been unfairly cut from the staff, Lazarev said. The newspaper did not disclose how many decisions had been reversed in the appeals process.

"The people with firing notices in their hands are varied. Some behave themselves calmly, while others are in tears," Lazarev said.

The newspaper commented that under such conditions, with fired workers lining up to appeal the decision, output at the ministries is less than ideal.

It criticized the Moscow government office responsible for finding new jobs for displaced workers, saying people were having better success pursuing employment on their own.

The newspaper also said the decisions about how to determine which employees should be fired were often being made behind closed doors, and commented that the process should be out in the open.

"There will probably be mistakes and miscalculations made," the newspaper said. "But it is necessary that everything be worked out calmly, soberly and democratically."

Concert to feature, salute composition of Pulitzer winner

By The Collegian Staff

A salute to the Pulitzer Prize-winning composer Gail Kubik will be held with the eighth annual joint concert of the K-State Symphonic Band and the U.S. Army 1st Infantry Division Band at 8 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium. The concert is free of charge.

Some of the selections the K-State Symphonic Band will play include the premiere of an unpublished piece called "Fanfare and March" by Kubik.

Another selection will be Kubik's Academy Award-winning score for the 1950 cartoon "Gerald McBoing Boing." It will feature soloist Stanley Finck, assistant professor of music. It's narrated by Ralph Titus, professor of extension communications and announcer at KKSU-AM.

A vocal soloist, Fort Riley's Col. Joseph Armistead, will be featured on Irving Berlin's piece "God Bless America."

The Army band will play various traditional marches and established band repertoire.

The concert offerings include "Marche Militaire Francaise," written by Camille Saint-Saens; "Cantica Sacra," written by Elliot Del Borgo; "Florentiner Marsch," written by Julius Fucik; "Concertino," written by Carl Maria von Weber; "Armed Forces Salute," written by Bob Lowden; and "America, The Beautiful," written by Samuel A. Ward.

Gradchecks help juniors decide on classes

By The Collegian Staff

For students finishing their junior year, planning for graduation is essential. Gradchecks are one way to complete that planning.

"Gradchecks are helpful to people deciding what they have to take, and by the end of their junior year they have to know so they can plan their last two semesters," said Marj Cleland, assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Gradchecks are done at the end of the semester in which a student completes his 85th hour. At the end of the semester, the college automatically does the gradcheck.

In the College of Arts and Sciences, a copy of the student's transcript is sent to the dean's office. The courses are written onto a form, and the student is given credit for all of the courses completed. The number of hours and basic degree requirements are then figured.

When the gradcheck is completed, copies are sent to the student and the department office of their major.

Cleland does 800 checks during a calendar year, with the expectation that 750 of the students will graduate. Because of time limitations, she is limited to doing checks only for those who are graduating within a year.

With two games left, 'Cats' attitudes not suffering

By Bill Lang
Sports Writer

The late Casey Stengel once said that 90 percent of the game is mental.

For the Wildcats' football team, the one part that is going well this season is the mental attitude and preparation for each and every game.

"We have to recognize the positive things that we've done," said K-State running back coach Mark Deal. "We try and see what we've done well and get the (players) to remember how they did it and how they should do it again."

With a record of 0-8-1, doesn't that make it tougher to think positive?

"Not really," Deal said. "The kids have come out to every practice paying close attention to the plays and gotten themselves ready to play."

Last weekend, though, K-State fell short of its first win of the season by the outstretched hands of University of Kansas strong safety Marvin Mattox. The result was a 17-17 tie between the two schools. Does that make the mental coaching any tougher?

"Shoot, the tie game was the most positive thing that we've done all year," Deal said. "It sure as hell is better than losing."

"As a group (the offensive unit) we wanted to have Tony (Jordan) get 150 yards (he ran for 147)," he said. "We also wanted to have the offense rack 200 yards in total offense (they compiled 299) and control the ball, and we did that."

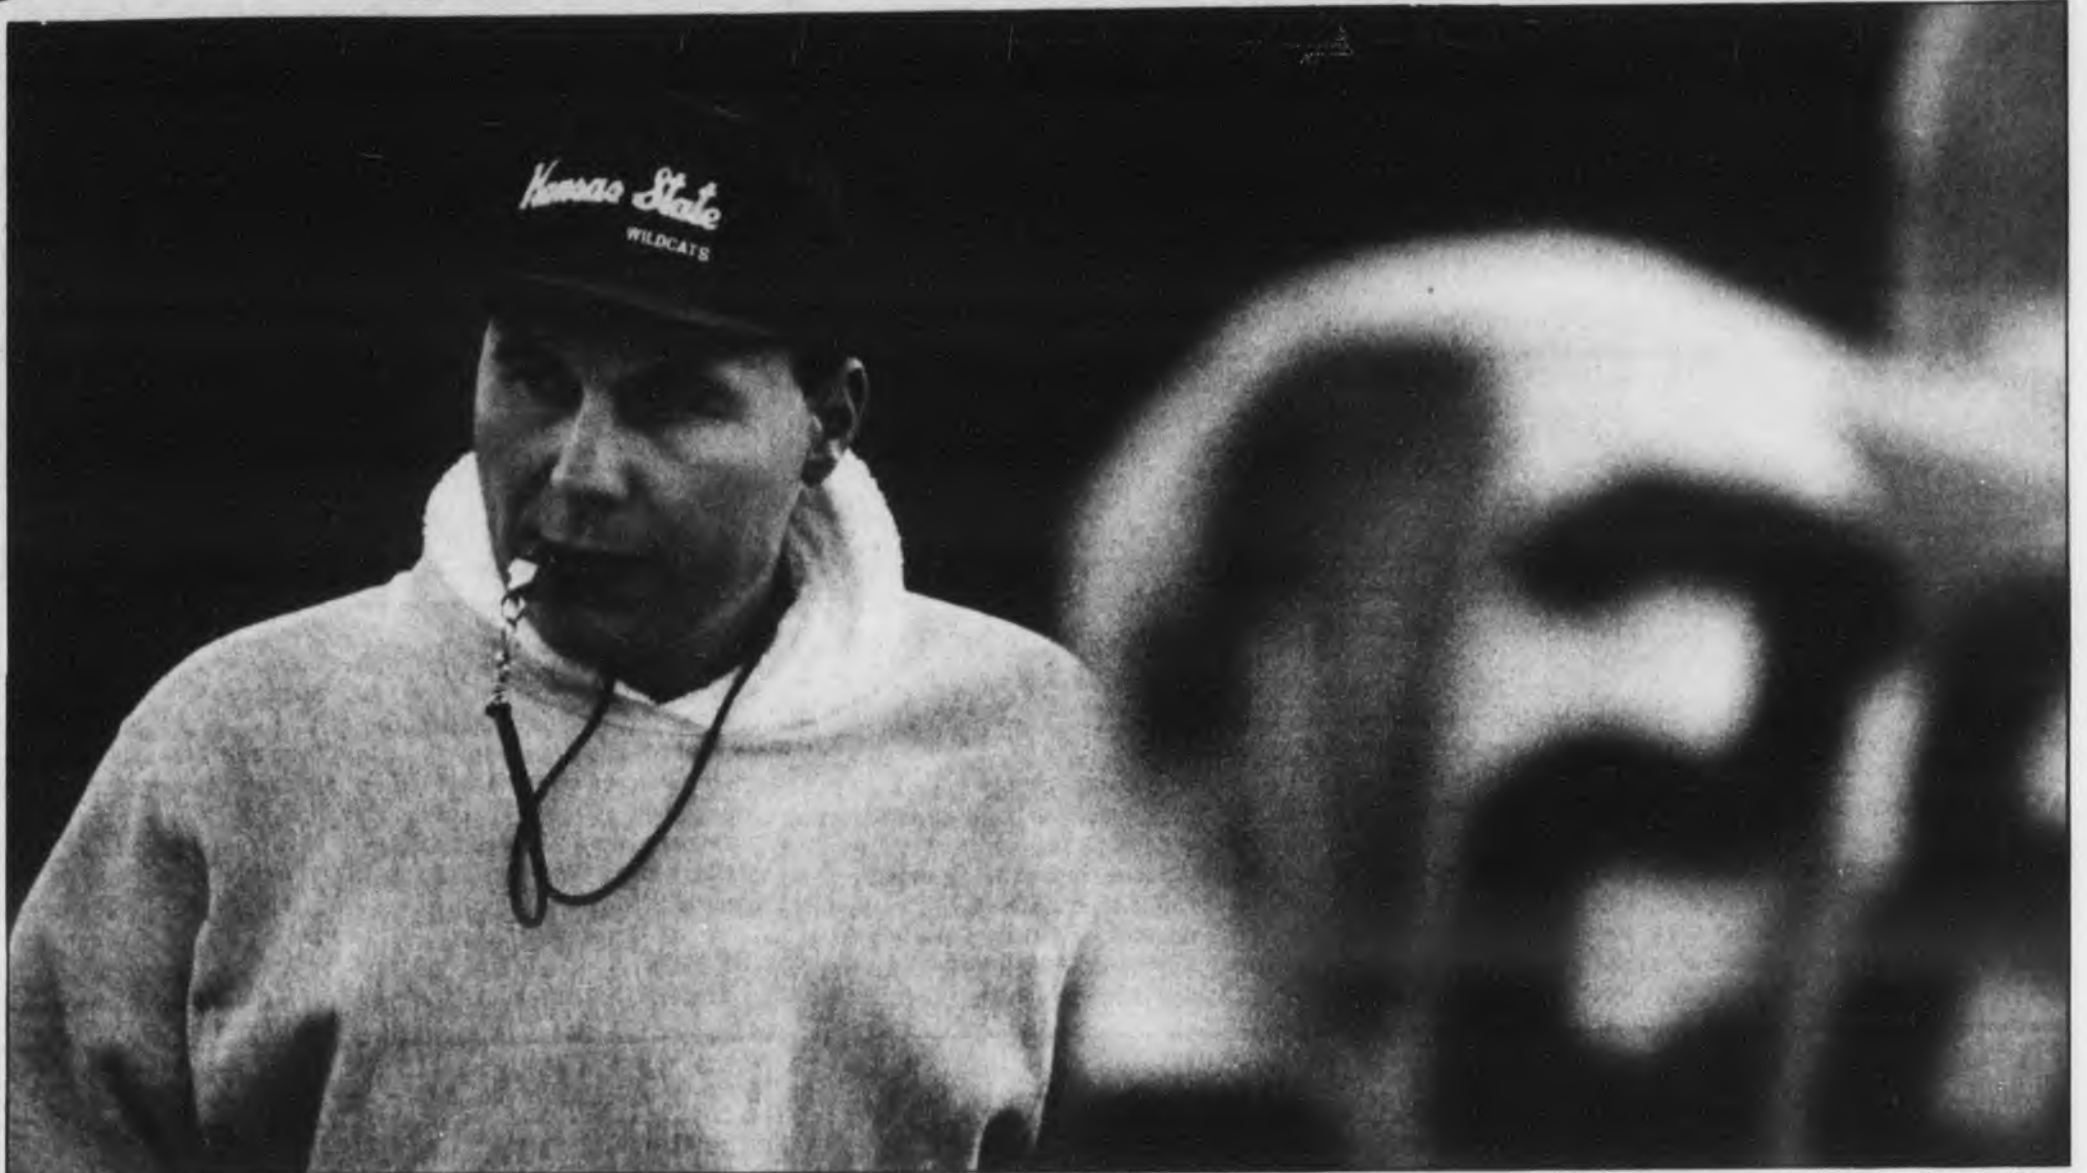

"We did everything we had to win the ball game...we just got beat by a good defensive effort."

After the KU game, Deal added, the players came away feeling like they had just won a game.

"The players felt good about the effort that they put out during the KU game," he said. "When you don't pour out the effort to win you know it; these kids know they put out the effort and feel proud of what they accomplished."

Deal commented that while some players might fall for the superstition part of the game — putting socks on the same way, wearing the same hat before game day or the same shirt for five days in a row — to his knowledge no players have acted that way all season long.

"If they are doing some things like that, they are probably changing it every week until they find something works," he said.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Running back coach Mark Deal believes the K-State offense accomplished many of the goals it set for its game against the University of Kansas but got beat by an "outstanding"

"Who knows, maybe they did after this weekend."

Deal added that the preparation is just the same for every game.

"It doesn't matter which game it is...Oklahoma, Nebraska, Iowa State or Kansas," he said. "We tell the kids what will work and what to be ready for, and try and get that into their heads."

"Sure, Kansas was a little bit different," he added. "But that's the way it is with every one's archival."

NOTES: Six K-State football players have been named to the Lee Jeans Academic All-Big Eight football team released today by the Big Eight Conference.

To qualify for the squad, players must have at least a 2.8 grade point average on a 4.0 scale and be among the top 44 players on their respective teams. First-year freshmen and first-year transfer students are not eligible.

In addition to the 25 first-team selections, (there was a tie in the defensive secondary), 20 other players received honorable mention recognition.

The lone K-State player named to the offensive team is senior lineman Matt Garver, a graduate student who carries a 3.71 grade point average in veterinary medicine. Running back Ray Wilson was honorable mention.

On the defensive side, senior lineman Dan

Goldner, who carries a 3.24 average in mechanical engineering, was named to the first team along with linebacker Matt Wallerstedt. The Manhattan senior owns a 2.94 grade point average in business.

Senior defensive back Brad Lambert is the final K-State starter. He has accumulated a 3.03 grade point average while pursuing a degree in business finance.

Another Wildcat defensive back, Erick Harper, was honorable mention on the defensive team.

K-State head football coach Stan Parrish believes the Wildcats gained some worthy defensive effort which resulted in a 17-17 tie Saturday in KSU Stadium. "It sure as hell is better than losing," Dell said.

experience last Saturday against the University of Kansas and is hoping to build on it this week against Iowa State University in Ames.

"We played a lot better on defense Saturday, and we hope to continue to do that," Parrish said. "It will be important for us to minimize our mistakes."

The Wildcats continued to prepare in practice today for the Cyclones, a true veer option team.

Two Wildcats missed the practice session but are expected to return tomorrow. Senior linebacker Matt Wallerstedt rested with a bruised knee, while senior defensive back Brad Lambert missed practice due to a staff infection.

All right, it's fake, but WWF is fun

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM PERRIN
Sports Columnist

I like professional wrestling. Really.

OK, there it is; I've said it. My conscience is clear.

No more Saturday afternoons of quick channel changing in fear that someone might actually see me watching "Superstars of Wrestling." No more subscribing to the official World Wrestling Federation magazine under an assumed name.

Now I can rest easy, knowing that my longstanding habit is out in the open. Yes, I like pro wrestling. And so what if I do? There, I've said it again.

I feel so cleansed.

So much for confession time. Now I can tell you why I like this garbage so much, even though it is so obviously fixed and fake.

Label me out of my mind, but I think pro wrestling is outrageously funny to watch. It's like a comedic soap opera with wrestlers' personalities changing from one extreme to another with little warning whatsoever.

Take Randy "Macho Man" Savage for example. Long one of my favorite wrestling personalities, Savage was nonetheless a rulebreaker hated by most fans. Savage cheated at every opportunity, using foreign objects and his lovely manager Elizabeth to win matches, even though he was a talented enough wrestler that he didn't need to.

Uttering phrases such as "History beckons the Macho Man" and "I am the Lord and Master of the ring" in a tone so abstract as to make him a larger-than-life figure, Savage was also one of the WWF's most colorful figures.

Some fans were entertained by Savage's out-of-the-ring antics and interviews, and impressed with his ring skills. Still, many others couldn't bring themselves to like Savage because of the many atrocities he committed against heroes such as WWF champion Hulk Hogan and Ricky "the Dragon" Steamboat.

So, the matchmakers got together. How could they increase the already massive appeal of the "Macho Man"? The answer was simple. Match Savage with the most disgusting personality in all of wrestling, the Honky Tonk Man, an Elvis impersonator so bad as not to be believed. Mere words cannot describe how utterly contemptible this man from Memphis actually is.

Well, one thing led to another and before you know it, Honky Tonk was pushing Elizabeth to the floor with a forearm and smashing his guitar over the head of the "Macho Man" as an NBC television audience watched. Presto, Savage is among the WWF's most loved wrestlers.

Some other personalities in pro wrestling are almost as intriguing and entertaining. One that sticks out in my mind is "The Million Dollar Man" Ted DiBiase, another of wrestling's most reprehensible figures. His motto: "Everybody has a price...for 'The Million Dollar Man.'"

Since his arrival in the WWF this summer, DiBiase has humbled every wrestler or unsuspecting fan stepping into his path. Accompanied by Virgil, his hulking manservant, DiBiase asks for volunteers from the audience to degrade themselves for sums of $200 to $500. In one of DiBiase's early atrocities, he paid off a woman to come on stage and bark like a dog in front of a packed arena.

Said DiBiase weeks ago on national television "I am filthy rich. You are all poor. That makes me better than each and every one of you." None of DiBiase's comments, obviously, are to be taken seriously.

Lately, DiBiase has taken to Bedrosian wins Cy Young; Schmidt signs

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Philadelphia reliever Steve Bedrosian, who led the major leagues with 40 saves, won the National League Cy Young Award Tuesday by the slimmest margin in the award's history.

Bedrosian, who set a major-league record with saves in 13 consecutive appearances, edged Rick Sutcliffe of Chicago 57-55 in voting by the Baseball Writers Association of America. Rick Reuschel, who played for Pittsburgh and San Francisco, finished one point behind Sutcliffe in third place.

The closest election prior to this year was in 1981, when Fernando Valenzuela of Los Angeles beat Tom Seaver of Cincinnati by three points.

Bedrosian is the third reliever to win the NL Cy Young Award since the leagues started giving out separate honors in 1967. Bruce Sutter of Chicago won in 1979, while Mike Marshall of Los Angeles was honored in 1974.

It is fourth time this decade that a Philadelphia pitcher has won the NL Cy Young Award. Steve Carlton won in 1980 and 1982, and John Denny won in 1983.

Bedrosian had a 5-3 record and earned run average of 2.83 in 1987.

He struck out 74 and walked 28 in 89 innings. Despite his outstanding season, the Phillies finished tied for fourth in the National League East with an 80-82 record.

After setting a club record with his 30th save, Bedrosian downplayed the feat.

"You can't think about records when you're out there," he said. "It's just my job to finish it up."

The 29-year-old right-hander was traded from Atlanta to Philadelphia on Dec. 10, 1985 for catcher Ozzie Virgil and pitcher Peter Smith. In his first season with the Phillies, Bedrosian had 29 saves along with an 8-6 record and 3.39 ERA.

Bedrosian spent five seasons in Atlanta, where he compiled a 34-39 record. In his final season with the Braves, he switched from relieving to starting and ended up with a 7-15 record and 3.83 ERA.

Sutcliffe had an 18-10 record and 3.68 ERA in 1987. Reuschel was 13-9 with a 3.09 ERA.

Orel Hershiser of Los Angeles finished fourth in the voting with 14 points. Dwight Gooden of New York and Nolan Ryan of Houston tied for fifth with 12 points. They were followed in the voting by Mike Scott of Houston with nine points and Bob Welch of Los Angeles with three points.

Two writers from each National League city take part in the voting.

IN OTHER Phillies news, Mike Schmidt signed a two-year, $4.5 million contract with the Philadelphia Phillies Tuesday, and, contrary to the usual practice, he had no qualms about everyone knowing the figures.

"It's for the benefit of my fellow players for the world to get out and for it to come right from me," the third baseman said.

"I'm saying to other players, their agents and their owners, this is what the top dollar is now. I want people to know that the Phillies were willing to pay me that. I hope it means something in other players' negotiations."

Schmidt, 38, cited money, good health and a belief he could reach another World Series as the reasons for his signing.

Schmidt said for each year of the contract he would earn $2.15 million in salary and $100,000 would be donated to a charity of his choice.

"The charity clause enabled his agents and Phillies president Bill Giles to settle the money portion of the contract," Schmidt told a news conference. "We took the difference between what I wanted and what the Phillies wanted to pay and donated it to charity."

The other hangup was hard bargaining over what would be guaranteed in the second year.

Schmidt said that was settled by giving the Phillies an option for 1989, and requiring the club to buy him out if it no longer wanted him.

Neither Giles nor Schmidt would disclose the amount of the buyout. Schmidt added that if he was injured and unable to play and had a guaranteed second year, there would be nothing to stop him from sitting back and collecting that $2.25 million.

The contract also contains an MVP incentive starting at $200,000 and dropping to $150,000, $100,000, $75,000 and $50,000 for finishing from second to fifth in the balloting.

He expressed optimism on the Phillies' chances to reach the playoffs and World Series in 1988.

Schmidt, who last season became the 14th member of the 500 or more home run club, recognized that 35 in each of the next two seasons would make him the fourth player ever to hit 600 or more. "My juices will start flowing at the end of 1989, when that could be a possibility," he said.

Top regular season prep football teams determined

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Manhattan finished its season in a familiar spot, at the top among the state's largest high schools, and four other teams went undefeated to lead their divisions in the Associated Press consensus football rankings.

Manhattan finished its perfect 9-0 season by creaming Salina Central, 31-0, and is the favorite to become Class 6A champion when the playoffs start Friday. The Indians have spent most of their season at No. 1.

Manhattan's defense has allowed a scant 55 points all season, while its offense has scored 303 points, an average of almost 34 per game. The Indians will face fifth ranked Emporia on the road in their first playoff game.

Second-ranked Derby and third ranked Olathe North also finished their seasons with perfect 9-0 marks. Derby defeated Wichita Southeast, 24-16, and Olathe North ran past crosstown rival Olathe South, 21-3. Dodge City barely kept its No. 4 ranking by squeaking by Wichita Northwest, 27-26, and Emporia jumped into the Top 5 after destroyed Wichita Heights, 54-0.

Derby will host Dodge City in the Class 6A regionals, and Olathe North entertains Lawrence, 8-1, last year's 6A champions. In the other playoff game, Kansas City-Schlagle, 7-1, travels across town to play Kansas City-Wyandotte, 7-2.

Wichita Kapaun remained atop Class 5A after it crushed Buhler, 35-3. Kapaun will face third-ranked Arkansas City in a regional playoff showdown. Arkansas City blanked Winfield, 22-0, to finish 8-1.

No. 2 Bishop Miege defeated Kansas City Ward, 29-6, and finished 8-1.

Here are the final regular-season AP consensus rankings:

Class 6A
1. Manhattan, 9-0. 2. Derby, 9-0. 3. Olathe North, 9-0. 4. Dodge City, 8-1. 5. Emporia, 8-1.

Class 5A
1. Wichita Kapaun, 8-1. 2. Bishop Miege,

8-1. 3. Arkansas City, 7-1. 4. Topeka Washburn Rural, 8-1. 5. Pittsburg, 7-2.

Class 4A
1. Augusta, 9-0. 2. Paola, 9-0. 3. DeSoto, 9-0. 4. Fredonia, 8-0. 5. Pratt, 8-1.

Class 3A
1. Medicine Lodge, 9-0. 2. Central-Burden, 8-0. 3. Burlington, 8-1. 4. Plainville, 7-2. 5. Smith Center, 8-1.

Class 2A
1. Stockton, 7-2. 2. Riley County, 9-0. 3. Lebo, 9-0. 4. Atwood, 9-0. 5. Troy, 8-1.

Eight Man I
1. Midway-Denton, 9-0. 2. Otis-Bison, 8-0. 3. St. Paul, 9-0. 4. Sedgwick, 9-0. 5. Greensburg, 8-1.

Eight Man II
1. Northern Valley, 9-0. 2. Tipton, 9-0. 3. Wakefield, 9-0. 4. Attica, 8-0. 5. LeRoy, 9-0.

often the members not paying attention, doing homework during Senate or missing meetings.

"The report given to us by the Ad Hoc Committee on Representation was a little late," Tatham said.

She explained Senate didn't have enough time before the November elections to act on the committee's suggestion of improving communication with residence hall and off-campus groups.

Routson said the low number of senators from the residence halls involved in student government may be due to participation in residence hall government.

"Many residence hall people get involved in their halls because they can see what's happening there," Routson said.

Jeff Wing, junior in economics and senator, said a higher percentage of young students — freshmen and sophomores who are less likely to run — live in the halls, thus explaining a higher level of greek representation.

Overall, fewer women voted than men in the election. While women comprise 45 percent of the student population at K-State, only 12.2 percent of the women at K-State turned out to vote. Fifty-five percent of the student body is men, and 14.5 percent of the men voted.

By classification, 19.9 percent of the voters were freshmen, 22.1 percent were sophomores, juniors totalled 26.5 percent, seniors totalled 28.6 percent, 2.6 percent were graduate students and 0.3 percent were in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

This information was obtained from the voluntary voter survey conducted by the Elections Committee. The form was located on the bottom half of SGA election ballots used Nov. 3 and 4. The results were tabulated by the Collegian staff.

In counting the voter survey, any incomplete responses were eliminated. Any ballot indicating an affiliation with a greek chapter and a residence hall was counted in the residence hall category. Ballots which indicated both a greek affiliation and living off campus were tallied with the off-campus category.

His plan involves increasing student salaries at the same rate as tuition increases, and enhancing the

"If students are not able to stay here because of financial reasons, then Margin of Excellence is not helping us," Lubbers said.

Taylor expressed his interest in finding a solution to the parking problem on campus, saying a parking lot north of Weber Hall may help. He said he would like to make use of the interest money earned from parking fees.

humiliating children. One particularly wholesome looking child was called on stage by DiBiase and asked to do as many pushups as he could. The youngster did eight. After consultation with Virgil, DiBiase determined that if the kid did 10 pushups, he would be rewarded with $300. Expanding every ounce of effort, and with the crowd shouting encouragement, the child struggled to nine pushups.

After watching the display, DiBiase said smugly: "That's pretty good, kid. But not good enough for 'The Million Dollar Man'." DiBiase then laughed as the poor youngster left the stage with tears in his eyes.

OK, maybe this whole thing is pretty cruel. But when you take into consideration that the act was a setup and that the kid probably was paid backstage and got to meet Hulk Hogan, it gets a lot funnier.

And this is only a small sample of the entertainment available weekly on pro wrestling. No, it's not something that everybody can get a rise out of, but hey, not everybody likes football either.

Obviously not to be taken seriously, pro wrestling is a pretty darn good time. And what's even better, I can now watch it with a clear conscience. Boy, do I feel better.

Officials carefully considering Kennedy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Judge Anthony M. Kennedy's selection to the Supreme Court could come as early as Wednesday, the White House said Tuesday, as officials reviewed FBI checks into Kennedy's background to guard against surprises.

With Kennedy's selection apparently imminent, President Reagan's chief advisers met at the White House along with a team of FBI investigators "to review the status of the FBI's work" in checking Kennedy's background, said presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater.

Fitzwater said there was "a possibility we'll have an announcement tomorrow."

"It just boils down to whether he's (Reagan) ready," Fitzwater said. "If we're ready, we'll do it."

Originally, Reagan had no activities on his schedule because it is Veterans Day, a federal holiday.

Fitzwater said a preliminary investigation could be completed by Wednesday but that a full field check of Kennedy's background, including interviews with associates and colleagues, will not be finished for some time.

White House officials went to unusual lengths to guard against the failures that brought down President Reagan's previous two choices.

Attorney General Edwin Meese, Meese, White House chief of staff Howard Baker, counsel A.B. Culvahouse and FBI Director William Sessions met at the White House along with a team of FBI investigators. And administration officials arranged

Reagan hopes to avoid third failure courtesy calls with leading senators for Kennedy amid Republican bickering over the defeat of Robert H. Bork and the withdrawal of Douglas H. Ginsburg.

In a Senate speech, moderate Republican Sen. William Cohen compared conservatives' criticism of White House chief of staff Howard H. Baker Jr. to a mugging "on the back stairs of the White House."

Reagan met for a half-hour Monday evening at the presidential residence with Kennedy, a federal appellate judge from Sacramento, Calif., spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said. The nomination announcement would be forthcoming before the week was out, he said.

A face-to-face session with the president is customarily the final step before such an announcement. But Fitzwater said it had been agreed that "more consultations would take place" first, particularly with members of Congress.

Kennedy, 51, was accompanied to the White House by Baker and Attorney General Edwin Meese III, two top advisers who reportedly have disagreed over strategy and nominees for the seat that has remained vacant for more than four months.

Meese and other conservatives are widely reported to have persuaded Reagan two weeks ago to select Ginsburg for the court seat after the Senate voted down Bork.

Baker is said to have favored Kennedy, and he has been accused by conservatives of undermining Ginsburg when an uproar followed Ginsburg's admission he smoked marijuana in the 1960s and 1970s.

On Tuesday, Cohen, R-Maine, said, "The truth is that Howard Baker was shoved overboard by the ideologically pure because he was recommending a 'confirmable conservative,'" Cohen said. "That phrase suggested compromise or, worse, appeasement."

Cohen said the conservatives took the view that in Ginsburg, "We've got a man who will make the Bork haters beg for a chance to recant."

But the Maine senator said that after the marijuana disclosure, it "was a group of conservatives who gathered on the floor and came to the conclusion that Judge Ginsburg had to go, not any liberals or not any moderates."

Cohen contended that if Baker had urged Reagan to fight for Ginsburg "to the very end, and then the vote was lost sometime in later December or early next year, his critics would have then blamed him for not advising the president to cut his losses more quickly."

"These attacks only confirm the fact that you can get mugged more easily on the back stairs of the White House than you can on the streets of any urban ghetto," Cohen said.

On Monday, conservative Republican Orrin G. Hatch of Utah told reporters there were "gutless wonders" in the White House who forced Ginsburg to request withdrawal of his nomination last Saturday, even though the nominee was willing to fight for confirmation.

Hatch would not say whether he counted Baker as a "gutless wonder" but commented, "Howard Baker believes almost everything can be compromised. I don't believe you compromise on principle, and there was a principle here."

Reagan, asked by reporters whether he still had confidence in Meese, said that he did, and he added, "He's no embarrassment to me" despite the failure of two Meese-backed nominees.

"I've known him for 20 years and I've found him of sound mind and great loyalty and capability in all that time," Reagan said.

Meese himself said he hadn't given any thought to resigning and "I don't think there's any disarray" in the administration.

Fitzwater said Tuesday that the White House was "still in the process of selecting a nominee," but he indicated the choice of Kennedy was a near-certainty.

Meanwhile, Meese said Tuesday he couldn't understand how Ginsburg's past marijuana use hadn't shown up in extensive FBI interviews with friends and associates.

The new James Bond... living on the edge.

JAMES BOND 007 THE LIVING DAYLIGHTS

British born actor Timothy Dalton makes a stunning debut as The Most Dangerous Bond of All in the 15th James Bond film. Dalton single-handedly confounds the KGB and greedy arms dealers, thwarts the private armies of the world's most dangerous heroin trafficker and dodges cutthroat terrorists! For thrills, action and romance it's the new James Bond.

BATTLESHIP POTEMKIN

Assigned by the Soviet government to re-create the revolution of 1905, Sergei Eisenstein's film tells the story of one incident of that revolution. The crew of the Battleship Potemkin revolted due to the inhumane conditions that pervaded the ship. Upon landing, the crew found the people of Odessa sympathetic to their cause and turned out on the steps of the waterfront to greet them where the cossacks stormed the crowd to repress any outbursts. "The Odessa Steps" sequence is perhaps the most widely discussed film sequence in film history. Consistently voted one of the 10 greatest films of all time by the International critics Poll.

Instant winning to begin today

By Janet Swanson
Agri/Business Editor

Beginning today, customers at more than 30 area stores can become instant winners in the Kansas Lottery, Up and Away.

Starting at midnight Wednesday, stores were allowed to sell the $1 tickets. Kick-off celebrations for the lottery will be at the Manhattan Town Center from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. Non-winning tickets can be placed in a barrel at the mall, and at 7 p.m. a winner will be drawn for the $1,000 prize. Entrants must be present to win. The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce is sponsoring the events.

The state celebration will be in Topeka from 11 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. on Kansas Avenue between Eighth and Ninth streets. Gov. Mike Hayden and Larry Montgomery, executive director of the Kansas Lottery Commission, will participate in the kick-off event.

Seven Manhattan Shop Quik stores were some of the few retailers that were open for the deadline.

"We're expecting a crowd the first few days. We're hoping to sell about 15,000 tickets in the first week," said Dave Oatman, supervisor of Shop Quik.

To accommodate the crowd, Oatman anticipates having to add an extra cashier at some of the stores. The ticket sales should also increase foot traffic in the store by about 5 percent, he said.

Although Kitchens Plus Inc. wasn't open for the deadline, Le Anne Williams, manager, expects a crowd when the store opens today.

"We hope to sell several hundred," she said.

Prizes in the rub-off game include: $2, $10, $50, $500 and $5,000. Beginning at the end of November, a winner will be drawn each week from the non-winning tickets that are sent in. This person will gain a chance to spin the wheel to win the $100,000 grand prize. The game is expected to last about 10 weeks.

Customers have been awaiting the lottery kick-off for the past few weeks, said Don Hodges, manager of Clipper Oil Co.

Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel's Retail Liquor, agreed with Hodges.

Lubbers defeats Taylor

Staff/Greg Vogel

Troy Lubbers, junior in marketing, receives word Wednesday evening that he will be student body president. Lubbers overcame a 66-vote deficit in the student body president election, Nov. 3-4, and defeated Jack Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, in the run-off.

Kennedy named

President's Court choice draws praise

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, saying he was "a bit wiser" after two failed attempts to put a hardline conservative on the Supreme Court, picked federal appeals judge Anthony M. Kennedy for the bench Wednesday and dropped his partisan attacks against the Democratic-run Senate.

Reagan said Kennedy, 51, has earned a reputation as "a courageous, tough but fair jurist" in his 12 years on the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco.

"He's popular with colleagues of all political persuasions," Reagan said. "And I know that he seems to be popular with many senators of varying political persuasions as well."

Kennedy is considered to be a moderate conservative, less ideologically rigid than Reagan's two earlier nominees, Robert H. Bork, who was defeated by the Senate, and Douglas H. Ginsburg, who quit after revealing he had smoked marijuana.

The new choice drew favorable comments from Democratic and Republican senators across the political spectrum.

Mindful of the problems he's had for more than four months in trying to fill the court opening, Reagan said he would not actually submit Kennedy's nomination until completion of a full-field FBI background check, which could take weeks.

And, in a conciliatory tone after months of tough rhetoric, the president abandoned his earlier promise to give the Senate a nominee that "they'll object to just as much" as Bork, his first candidate, who was rejected on a 58-42 vote.

"Sometimes you make a facetious remark and somebody takes it seriously and you wish you'd never said it," Reagan said in answer to a reporter's question. "That's one for me."

The president announced Kennedy's selection in a nationally broadcast appearance in the White House briefing room, accompanied by the judge, his wife, Mary, and their three children.

The choice appeared to be a clear effort to end a politically embarrassing episode for Reagan, who once said that winning Bork's confirmation was his No. 1 domestic priority.

Abandoning any pretense of confrontation with the Senate over filling the vacancy, the president said: "The experience of the last several Troy Lubbers said he felt "damn good" when notified that he had defeated Jack Taylor by 206 votes in the student body president run-off Wednesday.

Answering the call from the Elections Committee in a stairwell at the Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity, Lubbers let out a yell and received "high-fives" from his screaming supporters when he was told he would be the next student body president.

Lubbers, junior in marketing, defeated Taylor, junior in political science and life sciences, by a vote of 970-764. Last February's run-off between Michelle Benoit and Kent Bradley drew 2,080 voters — 346 more votes than were cast in this election.

Lubbers said he had been apprehensive about the possibility of a low voter turnout for the run-off.

"That scared me," he said. "Not just for myself, but for the position."

Lubbers had finished 66 votes behind Taylor in the Nov. 3-4 student body president general election, which required a run-off.

To make up the deficit, Lubbers said he launched a campaign of visitations to as many living groups as possible — meeting many people along the way.

"I was really just trying to make them my friends," Lubbers said.

"I think Troy made a really strong point when he went back to the living groups," said Lori Shellenberger, senior in political science and Lubbers' campaign manager.

Shellenberger believed the voters liked the common-sense approach

Debbie Fields, senior in finance and chairperson of the election committee, congratulates Lubbers at the Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity house.

Lubbers had toward the office of student body president during the campaign.

"I think people appreciated the fact that he was realistic," she said.

Lubbers said one of his first goals includes formulating a student response to the selective admissions proposal being considered by the Board of Regents. He also plans to get student input on the issues surrounding the "Margin of Excellence" program.

"I'd like to see that we get a lot accomplished at the state level,"

Soviet Communist Party boss dismissed

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin, a former protégé of Mikhail Gorbachev who criticized the slow pace of the Soviet leader's reform drive, was dismissed Wednesday as Moscow Communist Party boss.

His departure appeared to be a setback for Gorbachev's campaign for franker criticism of problems in Soviet society, and could herald a more conservative approach to the country's economic woes.

It was not immediately clear whether the removal of the 56-year-old Yeltsin marked a personal defeat for Gorbachev. Yeltsin, who as Moscow party chief held one of the top party posts in the country, was the highest-ranking Gorbachev protégé to lose his job since the Soviet leader took over in March 1985.

The 56-year-old Yeltsin had been among the most vocal supporters of Gorbachev's plans for "perestroika," the ambitious restructuring of the Soviet economy and society.

But at an Oct. 21 meeting of the party's Central Committee, Yeltsin criticized Gorbachev's style of leadership and the speed with which the Soviet leader's reform program was being implemented. He then offered to resign.

Gorbachev's position on Yeltsin's removal was not known, but the move seemed certain to strengthen the hand of party conservatives.

The official Tass news agency said the Moscow party committee on Wednesday found Yeltsin guilty of "major shortcomings" in his work as party chief and relieved him of his duties.

It said the meeting also approved a decision made at the October Central Committee meeting to brand Yeltsin's critical speech "politically erroneous."

Yeltsin was succeeded by Lev Zaikov, 63, a member of the 13-man ruling Politburo who once headed the Communist Party apparatus in Leningrad, the Soviet Union's largest city after Moscow.

Tass said Gorbachev spoke at Wednesday's Moscow party meeting, but gave no details. It was not known when Gorbachev last attended a meeting of the committee.

Gorbachev criticized "headstrong" advocates of domestic reform in a Nov. 2 speech that appeared to be directed at Yeltsin and others demanding quicker implementation of reforms.

"It should be clear that one cannot leap over essential stages and try to accomplish everything in one go," Gorbachev said. "Reconstruction carries on the revolutionary cause, and today it is absolutely essential to master the skill of exercising revolutionary self-restraint."

Yeltsin, who was named to a candidate, or non-voting, seat on the Politburo in February 1986, reportedly drew a rebuke after his speech last month from Yegor Ligachev, the Kremlin's no. 2 man and a reputed conservative force in the Politburo.

Ligachev also took part in the Moscow party meeting, Tass said, without providing details.

Despite the Kremlin's policy of "glasnost" or openness, party sessions like the plenum of the Moscow city committee and October's Central Committee meeting are usually reported in general terms.

Yeltsin, former party boss of the industrial city of Sverdlovsk in the Urals, was appointed Moscow party chief in December 1985.

He moved energetically to better the food supply and housing of Muscovites, and dismissed many officials in the capital's party apparatus.

Yeltsin's forays onto Moscow streets to sample bread and other wares on sale made him popular with many Muscovites.

Plans made for Soviet summit

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Soviet experts met Wednesday to plan next month's summit, as a U.S. official said General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev would limit his stay to three days and spend all of the time in the nation's capital.

The planning will continue over the next two weeks, and while arrangements are "complicated," they will be worked out in time for the opening of Gorbachev's talks with President Reagan on Dec. 7, said the official, who demanded anonymity.

Reports out of Moscow carried by some American newspapers quoted unidentified Soviet officials as saying Gorbachev might be interested in staying longer and having more time to get his views across to the American people. But the U.S. official here told The Associated Press that a three-day visit was a settled matter.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater also said that there had been no indications from the Soviets that Gorbachev would stay beyond the summit meeting.

The planning sessions are being conducted at the White House.

White House Communications Director Thomas Griscom, Colin Powell, deputy national security adviser, and Rozanne L. Ridgway, assistant secretary of state for European affairs, met with their Soviet counterparts Wednesday.

TB suspects sent home

EMPORIA — Emporia school officials sent 21 high school students home Wednesday, instructing them not to return until they can prove they cannot infect others with tuberculosis.

Emporia High School nurse Ilene Meyer on Tuesday had sent home a student who was coughing up blood, a sign of an advanced case of tuberculosis. District Superintendent Harold Hosey said Wednesday that a diagnosis had not been made, but tuberculosis was suspected. He said a diagnosis was expected in two or three days.

Hosey said the student who coughed up blood and the other students sent home Wednesday were all international students who were new to the district, and many had not had medical examinations before enrolling. Hosey said most of the students sent home would return Thursday.

Under state law, the students cannot return to school until they provide evidence from a physician that they are not contagious.

School officials stressed that community health is not threatened.

Limitations statute extended

BOSTON — Massachusetts has extended its statute of limitations for child abuse cases until victims reach age 26.

"This law will allow each abused child more time to come forward with his or her story and it will give prosecutors additional time to ensure that child abusers don't beat the clock," said Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who signed the extension Tuesday.

The statute of limitations for prosecuting crimes in Massachusetts is generally six years from when the crime occurred, except for certain serious acts, such as murder, where the limit is 10 years.

The new law extends the statute of limitations for child abuse cases to 10 years.

Shooting investigation begins

CHANUTE — A man who apparently took his own life after killing another man Tuesday morning had been arrested for disorderly conduct during a weekend incident, as had the man who was slain, according to police reports.

Richard Mosley, 25, of Chanute, was shot and killed late Tuesday morning at the apartment of John and Angela McGinnis, where he had been living. Officers called to the home then went to the residence of another Chanute man, Robert Knudsen, 21, and found him on the floor with a gunshot wound to his head. He died later at a Wichita hospital.

Results of autopsies conducted in Wichita were expected Thursday.

"The investigation is still underway," said Neosho County Attorney Charles Bennett. "At this point we don't have the slightest information that anyone else was involved. To me, it appears to be a straight homicide-suicide."

Tests show some shed AIDS

BALTIMORE — Researchers at Johns Hopkins Hospital are studying several people who suddenly tested negative for exposure to the AIDS virus after repeated positive tests, according to a report broadcast Wednesday.

The researchers are confident the tests on the patients were accurate, and are trying to find out whether some people might be able to rid themselves of the AIDS virus naturally, WBAL-TV reported.

"The observation is very interesting," said Dr. Homayoon Farzadegan, a researcher at Hopkins' AIDS unit. "It could mean some answers to that question. Are people being infected in the world that can get rid of the virus?"

Doctors have been unable to find a cure for acquired immune deficiency disease syndrome, and no vaccine has been developed against the human immunodeficiency virus, which is blamed for causing the fatal disease.

The people in the Hopkins study had not developed any of the life-threatening infections or cancers that result when the AIDS virus weakens the body's immune system, the researchers said.

In reviewing lab test results of patients who had tested positive for the AIDS virus, the researchers said they discovered at least three people who tested negative for HIV after repeated retesting had earlier produced positive results.

Would-be robber left puzzled

BOULDER, Colo. — A man walked into the Mellon Boulder Industrial Bank and demanded money, but the bank is liquidating its assets voluntarily and no longer maintains deposits.

When a teller informed him the bank didn't have any money, "he gave her a puzzled look, turned and left," said David Grimm, a Boulder police spokesman.

Bank officials declined comment. The FBI is not investigating because the bank was not insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

State officials have frozen the assets at 13 industrial banks that lacked FDIC coverage in an attempt to avoid a crisis in the industry. Regulators hope to repay deposits by selling off the assets.

Mellon, however, is not under state control and is voluntarily liquidating assets, according to state banking officials.

Shirley Hadley Abbott looks at some of the memorabilia of her son, 1st Lt. Leo Larry Hadley, who was killed in Vietnam in 1968. Since his death, Abbott has made every day a memorial to her son.

K-State alum remembered

U.S. holiday difficult time for mother

By Alison Neely
Staff Writer

Veterans Day is never pleasant for Shirley Hadley Abbott. For that matter, neither is August 14, the day her only son died in Vietnam.

Since 1st Lt. Leo Larry Hadley's death in 1968, Abbott has made every day a memorial to her son. His medals, certificates and picture occupy an important place in her living room. During his four years in the Army, Hadley received two Purple Hearts, a Bronze Star, a Silver Star, a Vietnam Campaign medal and a Vietnam Service medal.

Hadley died during the 1968 Tet offensive. From his company of approximately 150 people, there were only 17 survivors, Abbott said. "He was just the all-American, fun-loving guy. He was a beautiful dancer and liked to take the girls out on dates," she said.

A military wife herself, Abbott never questioned the merits of the Vietnam War.

"I never doubt the United States of America and what they (the Congress and the military) are doing, right or wrong," Abbott said.

Abbott believes being married to a military officer is like being married to an airplane pilot. He leaves and you don't know if or when he'll be back, she said. It was this philosophy that kept her from fearing Hadley's enlistment.

Hadley held the same respect for the military. A 1964 K-State graduate in political science, he turned down an apprenticeship in the Kansas House of Representatives to enlist in the Army.

"It was just natural that he was going to follow in his father's footsteps," Abbott said. "He used to tell me that ROTC is not what the real Army is like. (He'd say) 'I don't like it but I'll do it.'"

Hadley served 11 of his 12 scheduled months in Vietnam. He died one month to the day before he would have been released.

The battle during which he died was so intense it was three days before the military was able to recover the bodies, Abbott said. Due to the climate, the body was too decomposed to open the casket at the funeral.

A 24-hour guard was placed over the body at the funeral home. It was the first time that had happened here (Manhattan), Abbott said.

After Hadley's death, Abbott lost her zeal for life.

"(Many times) you wake up in the middle of the night and say 'why me,'" she said.

Explosion in Beirut kills six, wounds 73 in crowded airport

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A briefcase packed with explosives blew up in a crowded passenger terminal in Beirut's airport Wednesday, killing six people, including the woman who carried it, and wounding 73 others, police said.

The blast occurred a day after the international airport reopened following a five day general strike.

The woman who carried the deadly briefcase was posing as an outgoing passenger, police said. She was identified as Soraya Sahyouni, a Sunni Moslem Lebanese.

"The explosion split her in two," said a police spokesman, who spoke on condition of anonymity. He refused to speculate on the motive behind the attack.

Five other Lebanese died, police said, adding that most of the injured were Lebanese and other Arabs bound for gulf nations.

"I was checking in when the explosion occurred. The devastating impact almost choked me. I struggled for breath and then dove for cover," said Jacqueline Karakjian, a Lebanese passenger bound for Jiddah, Saudi Arabia.

"When I regained control of my faculties, I saw blown-off legs and arms all around me," Miss Karakjian said.

One witness said he saw "at least four people lying on the floor with blood soaking their clothes and glass shards all around them."

"A man's leg was chopped off.

Blood littered the airport's entrance. Everybody panicked. Women passengers shouted as they carried their children out of the airport premises," said the man, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Meanwhile, in Christian east Beirut, gunmen shot and seriously wounded a Frenchman, a Christian television broadcast said. The Lebanese Broadcasting Corporation television identified the victim as Richard Gimpel, 46, an engineer who has been living in Beirut for 10 years.

A spokesman at the Notre Dame of Lebanon Hospital told The Associated Press the victim was in a coma with two bullets in his head.

The airport bomb went off at the main entrance to the airport's terminal at 3:58 p.m.

Muckraking achieves new political heights

The recent revelation over Judge Douglas Ginsburg's marijuana smoking during his youth is only the latest in a series of unpleasant facts that have put political candidates out of contention. Following his request that his nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court be withdrawn, Ginsburg's chances of winning a seat on the high court are now dismal.

As far as political dominoes are concerned, Ginsburg is merely the latest to topple. However, his defeat has virtually confirmed that a new era of political scrutiny has been ushered in.

The rules of the political game have changed dramatically over the past several months. First came the ouster of Gary Hart after his much-publicized exploits in both Bimini and his Washington, D.C., townhouse with a model named Donna Rice.

The next candidate to go was Joe Biden when it was revealed that he had plagiarized part of a speech and lied on his resume. His political aspirations went unfulfilled as he withdrew from the race.

The next figure to take a fall was GOP presidential candidate Pat Robertson. Though not officially out of the race, the former minister and television evangelist was damaged significantly when it was discovered that he fathered his first child out of wedlock.

And now, Ginsburg is the latest to be touched by political scandal. While the Hart, Biden and Robertson incidences were relatively clear-cut in regards to their newsworthiness, the Ginsburg incident was more difficult to judge.

Ginsburg's crime is one that many lawyers and other professionals in their early 40s would have to admit to. More than a few of those who were in college in the tumultuous '60s, as Ginsburg was, partook of marijuana on one or more occasions.

The Ginsburg incident has fully confirmed that any past dirt on a candidate invariably will be exposed. Good or bad, right or wrong, checking into a candidate's personal life for decades in the past is now a common tactic.

And those who venture into the political forum must have wills of iron and stomachs of stone.

When all is said and done, the 1988 campaign season is likely to yield a new political reality in the United States. And that's a reality all Americans — and candidates — will have to accept.

Funding for education cannot be overlooked

Once again education in Kansas is being considered as second or even third fiddle to other pet projects of state administration officials.

Indicative of this thinking is a comment made by Secretary of State Bill Graves, who said highways should be considered first in funding discussions because education is not as bad off and can wait for money later.

Granted, college students might have a slightly biased opinion concerning funding for education. However, anyone exposed to education in this state should realize that schools are in desperate need of money.

Educators in Kansas have been operating programs on next to nothing for many years because the government has said there is not enough money. When Gov. Mike Hayden implemented his across-the-board salary cuts a couple of years ago, schools were hit as hard as anyone. Money has always been siphoned away from education, so why not do it again this year? Right?

Wrong. If the Kansas Board of Regents goes ahead with its selective admissions policy, then some high schools will be forced to add courses so their students will even be eligible for college. Also, through the $47 million "Margin of Excellence" plan, the Regents are attempting to raise the pay of some faculty members to bring them up to par with their peers around the country.

Where will the money come from if education takes a back seat again? Nowhere, and educators will find themselves operating on a shoestring budget again. Officials want Kansans to be better educated, and yet, they don't want to pay for it.

Everyone faces change

Losses, gains must be experienced

An expanse of wheat fields and corn fields, a sunset glowing on the horizon, and tornadoes — these are specific features of Kansas that I have seen. Until I first learned about tornadoes as a middle school student in Korea, I used to imagine them as imaginary things in fairy tales and in imaginary lands.

Many years have passed since my childhood, and I am living in this place where I had never thought or dreamed to live. I think that Kansas does not have much attractive scenery. Summer and winter come quickly and last long, while spring and autumn come slowly and are short. Those conditions may be good advantages for foreign students to study hard, since there is no lure of an attractive nature.

However, this autumn in Manhattan is unexpectedly prettier than any other one. The song of the blue jays sounds as if it is a prelude of coming fall and the promise of change. Unconsciously, I look toward the tops of trees and, to my surprise, the leaves there seem tinged with a magnificent glow. The bases of the trees house yellowish-colored leaves, but along the sides and peaks the leaves are tinted with peach and rose. The city of Manhattan is alive with a richly colored splendor of yellows, reds, greens and "flaming" trees along all the roadsides, hills and woods.

Looking at the high, clear skies and sparkling weather, I reflect on my beautiful memories of the Korean autumn: of walking along the flowery roads, of talking with friends while hearing the sounds of falling leaves, and of singing while treading on the garden carpeted with fallen leaves. Such beautiful memories make me flutter.

I look at the colorful beauty of Manhattan as though I have never seen such beauty before this fall. It might be hard for me to recognize the sense of season due to my heavy roles as a wife, a mother and a student. I have made a tremendous effort to adjust, or to survive, in the U.S. It has become easy for me not to recognize the passing of season and time.

I am now standing on the brink of my middle age and looking at myself in front of the mirror. I see wrinkles waving around my eyes, discolorations on my face, and the delicate skin is already fading. I try to hold the beauty of young age for a little longer and keep the sense of youth. I know this is a part of the struggles of the aging person. However, I wonder if I can stay young forever and even recognize the ephemeral life.

John Schneider states that "Everyone faces changes in their lives — some of them wanted and some clearly not. Each of the people has been going through changes." Through the process of the changes, people's gains can outweigh their losses or their losses can outweigh their gains. A person cannot completely make gains or losses through changes. An individual cannot lead his/her life without experiencing some measure of both losses and gains. I think this may be the providence of God.

My unexpected living in Manhattan is a vigorous change in my life. The meaning of "loss" through the change gives me feelings of ephemeral life and regret as a fastidious wife, a strict mother, and a stressful student.

On the other hand, the improvement of knowledge, getting certification as the first Korean family-life educator, and the opportunity to learn the American culture are "gains." Through this process of change, I realize the coexistence of "gains and losses." That is, there is some potential for loss and for growth. A person experiences both gains and losses through any change in life. Therefore, the important thing is how people can enhance their own growth and personal development through the process of changes that they undergo.

My young-aged years spent in Manhattan have been a constant effort to gain a better life. It has been as hard as rowing a boat against a heavy windstorm. However, I am now on the horizon of my middle age, and I expect my future to be embroidered by many-colored threads — like the colorful splendor of a Manhattan autumn.

Letters

Blame for leaflets

Editor,

The persons responsible for placing leaflets on vehicles last week are a group of semi-terrorists paid by Khomeini. The adjective "semi-terrorists" is not used loosely here, but is an apt description of Khomeini agents. They should not be referred to as "Iranian," but rather as elements of Khomeini's regime which by no stretch of the imagination is a popular one in Iran. These agents have been sent abroad under the guise of "students" in order to spy on and to harass dissident Iranian students through whatever means possible (including beating, stabbing and in some cases, e.g., in Pakistan, murdering).

Iran-Iraq War. Although Iraq is believed by some to have started the war, Khomeini, in fact, provoked Iraqi aggression by attempting to export his reactionary form of government to Iraq and officially declaring his intent to effect the overthrow of the existing Iraqi government.

In the summer of 1982, one year after the war began, Iraq withdrew its troops from Iran and indicated its desire to sign a peace treaty with the assistance of an international mediating committee. Iraq has continuously expressed its willingness for peace and has signed a peace treaty with Mr. Rajavi, the leader of the Iranian Resistance. Moreover, all countries of the region, Moslem countries and organizations, as well as internationally known organizations such as the United Nations and Non-Aligned Movement, have repeatedly called for a cease-fire and negotiations to end hostilities. But only Khomeini resists any peacemaking efforts.

As a result, since 1982, the war has inflicted 1.5 million casualties, 2.5 million refugees and over $500 billion in damages on the Iranian side only. Khomeini is the party solely responsible for this carnage and destruction.

By Khomeini's order, his agents here seek to legitimize this ugly and senseless war under the banner "punish the invader." One would wonder why Khomeini's agents themselves are not going to these "holy" fronts of death to fight the invaders? Also, since 1982, Khomeini has promised many times a "final strike" or the "year of destiny" (i.e., the overthrow of the Iraqi government) when, in fact, his forces have failed to invade more than several dozen miles of Iraqi soil.

Khomeini seeks to perpetuate the war. This is his self-serving means to stay in power and to justify a failing economy, arbitrary detentions and, above all, the continuing torture and executions of Iranian citizens, which are documented by Amnesty International and the UN. (The UN in its latest resolution on Sept. 4, while condemning Khomeini's regime, reported that more than 70,000 have been executed by Khomeini with as many as 150,000 being imprisoned in deplorable conditions.)

It should be noted that crimes committed by Khomeini are neither related to the religion Islam nor the Iranian culture. Khomeini's regime is inherently inhumane and illegitimate. This is why it is hated by the majority of the Iranians and a greater part of world public opinion.

Bookstore protest

Editor,

Since Kansas State University is a state educational institution, which is supported by state funds, I feel that there is some material sold in the bookstore that is not suitable to the educational atmosphere. I am referring to the two magazines, Playboy and Penthouse, which are sold here on campus.

This type of material is inappropriate and detracts from the educational atmosphere. Should this type of material be sold here on campus? The University of Kansas sells no such material. I think we all need to think about this and let our student government and bookstore manager know how we feel. Let's not allow this material to be sold here on campus.

months has made all of us a bit wiser."

Invoking the spirit of the bicentennial of the Constitution, he called for a bipartisan effort to fill the opening, created by the retirement in June of Justice Lewis F. Powell.

On Capitol Hill, the reaction echoed Reagan's attempt to overcome the bitterness generated by the Bork and Ginsburg nominations.

"I can't see any good reason for anyone opposing this, from Jesse Helms to Teddy Kennedy," said Sen. Pete Wilson, R-Calif. Sen. Kennedy, D-Mass., had led the fight against Bork, while Sen. Helms, R-N.C., once had threatened to filibuster against Judge Kennedy as not sufficiently conservative.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., chairman of the Judiciary Committee that will handle the nomination, said "Kennedy seems on the surface like a mainstream conservative justice whom I can support, but I'm going to withhold final judgment until I know a lot more about him. Obviously, we have learned that it's not wise to be hasty in these nominations."

Sen. Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., considered a swing vote on the Judiciary Committee on court nominations, said Kennedy "comes with good credentials. He's well respected."

During a 35-minute meeting Monday, Reagan asked Kennedy if there was anything in his background that would prove embarrassing, said presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater. He said there was nothing.

Kennedy told reporters he had been asked if he ever smoked marijuana. "The answer was — no, firmly, no," he said.

Kennedy, passed over when Reagan picked Ginsburg Oct. 29, was flown to Washington last Saturday when Ginsburg pulled out.

He underwent three hours of "no-holds-barred" questioning by Reagan's top lieutenants Sunday about his personal life and integrity, Fitzwater said. That was followed by 10 hours of interviews by FBI agents Monday and Tuesday.

Among other things, FBI agents looked into Kennedy's onetime position as a lobbyist for liquor distiller and opticians. White House chief of staff Howard Baker reported to Reagan Wednesday morning that no problems had cropped up in Kennedy's past, and the announcement was hurriedly arranged.

Calvin Hall site of third bomb threat

By The Collegian Staff

A bomb threat caused the evacuation of Calvin Hall for about 30 minutes Wednesday morning.

Classes resumed after a search failed to produce any explosives, said Charles Beckom, K-State police chief. The search was conducted by six campus police officers.

The call, placed at 9:15 a.m., was at least the third of the semester. On Oct. 30, a bomb threat emptied Seaton Hall and on Nov. 2 one caused an evacuation of Umberger Hall.

"We've got exams going. I'll let you draw your own conclusions," Beckom said.

A record of the number of bomb threats from each semester is not recorded, and the chances of finding the caller are about the same as solving any crime, said Lt. James Tubach, K-State detective.

Negotiators 'on threshold' of cutting budget deficit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — White House and congressional negotiators, working on a federal holiday, are "on the threshold" of creating a framework for cutting the budget deficit, a Republican participant said Wednesday.

The negotiators worked against a self-imposed deadline of Friday for coming up with a package of tax increases and spending cuts that would reduce the deficit by at least $23 billion, meet the requirements of the Gramm-Rudman law and signal a jittery world economy that the U.S. government could control its finances.

After meeting for more than five hours in hopes of reaching an agreement, Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., ranking GOP member of the Senate Budget Committee, asked if they had finished, responded: "No, but we're getting as close as can be."

Rep. Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass., top GOP member of the House Appropriations Committee, said: "We're on the threshold."

But House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski,

D-Ill., said, "We were closer at noon than at the end of the day, mainly because we began to get specific."

Other participants agreed that the negotiations ran into some snags as members got into the details.

Earlier in the day, Rep. Pat Williams, D-Mont., said that "we have no choice but to come to an agreement." He added: "If this were a voting body, we'd have an agreement by now." But, he said, consensus must rule in the talks.

"We're not all that terribly far apart," said House Republican Leader Robert Michel of Illinois.

White House officials conferred frequently outside the negotiating room in the Capitol, carrying with them lists of numbers, but most declined to comment on the talks.

"We're just going to keep working — that's what we've been doing," said Treasury Secretary James A. Baker III.

On their 13th day of talks, there was a growing sense that time is running out as the participants gathered on Veterans Day — a holiday for most federal workers — while a November snowstorm struck the city. Participants said they had narrowed their differences on broad totals — how much taxes would rise, how much spending would be cut — but many of details of how to do it remained unsettled.

The goal is to reduce the deficit by more than $23 billion, as required by the Gramm-Rudman budget-balancing law. That statute calls for action by Nov. 20 to avert automatic spending cuts.

Both Democrats and Republicans have proposed compromises including tax increases and spending cuts which would reduce the deficit by $30 billion or more in fiscal 1988, which began Oct. 1.

However, Democrats have favored about $12 billion in new taxes — roughly twice the GOP figure — to avert sharp cutbacks in domestic spending plans. Both sides in the talks would increase enforcement of current tax laws to raise some revenue.

Talks continued of a freeze in spending, or only slight increase, for most domestic programs.

Increase seen in scholarships

By Jim Vader
Collegian Reporter

K-State's enrollment was not the only tangible asset experiencing an increase this year. Scholarship monies for continuing students and minority students also increased, said Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president of special services, and Larry Moeder, associate director of Student Financial Assistance.

"Minority scholarship monies increased 23 percent in 1986-87, while this year they increased 48 percent," Switzer said.

Moeder said restricted scholarship aid to continuing students increased about 50 percent, from $57,000 in 1986-87 to $100,000 this year.

"This figure sounds deceiving, because it doesn't seem like all that much for so many students," he said. "But we (financial assistance) award a lot of other scholarships restricted by the donor — for example, by county."

Continuing students, minorities get money

These restricted scholarship monies also increased this year, but the exact figures will not be totaled until the end of the 1987-88 school year, Moeder said.

Switzer said the minority scholarship committee received $22,200 in 1986-87 to be awarded to Hispanic Americans, Mexican Americans, American Indians, Negroes and Asian Americans who are U.S. citizens. This year, the committee received $33,000.

"The reason for the rise in minority scholarship amounts is due to the rise in general scholarships for the entire student body," he said.

"Five percent of our University enrollment is in a minority form," Switzer said. "The minority scholarship committee asked that we be considered to receive five percent of all general academic scholarship monies.

"Last year, we had 75 of 671 minority undergraduates (11 percent) receive an academic scholarship," he said.

The minority scholarship committee is composed of Switzer; Moeder; Hakim Salah-Din, assistant director of admissions; Nancy Twiss, College of Arts and Sciences adviser; Karen Hummel, director of minority engineering programs; Diana Caldwell, minority student development coordinator; Antonia Pigno, director of the minority research center; and Andrea Shelton, graduate assistant for the office of Educational Supportive Services.

Switzer said this committee is responsible for selecting minority scholarship recipients.

The "awarding season" runs from Jan. 15 to April 15, he said.

"Our applicants have to have at least a 3.0 GPA and must maintain a high average based on past performance. It also deals on leadership ability that the student possesses," Switzer said.

He said he thinks K-State's minority programs are improving and are on par with other Big 8 Conference institutions.

"I know that Oklahoma and Oklahoma State, because of a court decision, had to improve their minority education," Switzer said. "I also believe that the University of Kansas and the University of Missouri have strong minority programs."

Kansan convicted for spousal rape

By The Associated Press

NEWTON — The conviction of a Newton man charged with raping his estranged wife reaffirms a 4-year-old change in the state's rape statute, says Harvey County Attorney Mike Cleary.

"A not-guilty verdict would have been a real setback for the new law. This is going to tell the public that the rape of anyone is illegal and will be prosecuted," Cleary said following the conviction Tuesday night of Victor White, 40.

The county attorney praised the work of the jury of five women and seven men at the two-day trial that he said produced the first conviction under the 1983 revised statute ending immunity from prosecution in spousal rape cases.

"It took a lot of courage on the jury's part to arrive at this verdict. They had to sift through a great deal of marital discord to get to the fact that this man raped his wife," Cleary said. The jury deliberated about three hours.

White was charged with attacking his estranged wife on an isolated country road west of Newton Sept. 3 following a lengthy discussion about a possible reconciliation. His wife was granted a divorce after the charge was filed.

Randy Pankratz of Newton, White's lawyer, refused to comment on the verdict.

RURAL

"It's really hard to give up on something you worked so hard for."

LIFE

Story by Linda Huddleston
Photos by Jennifer Quist

After living on their farm for six years, Glen and Cathy Swartz were forced to deed their farm to the Federal Land Bank and the Farmers Home Administration. Glen and Cathy discuss their accounting system in the living room.

Fluctuating economic conditions, personal and family crises and farm foreclosures are all very familiar to the Glen and Cathy Swartz family of rural Alta Vista.

After living on their farm for six years, the Swartzes were forced to deed it back to the Federal Land Bank and the Farmers Home Administration in 1986 because of failure to make loan payments.

"The land payments were costing so much we just couldn't hold onto the farm any longer," Cathy said. "We lost all the money we invested into loan payments and interest, and it's really hard to give up on something you worked so hard for."

The Swartzes have three children: Jason, 9; Haley, 5; and Casey, 3. Like many other families that faced farm crisis situations, they experienced times of moodiness, depression and stress.

"The hardest thing for me was to watch Glen try to figure out ways to save our farm," Cathy said. "At the time, farm foreclosures were often contributed to mismanagement, and we were the first ones in our community to have a real financial crisis."

busy to play and have fun," Cathy said. "I think the younger the children are when the crisis occurs, the more flexible they will be in this sort of situation."

After long hours at the table every night thinking about their options, the Swartzes finally decided to deed back the farm. It was then that some of the tension started to be relieved.

"After deciding to deed it back, things were a little better, but it still hurt," Cathy said. "It was hard to give it up, but if we hadn't done it then we probably would have made one or two more payments and lost that, too."

The Swartzes were released from the financial burden of paying off the remainder of their farm loan. Instead, the FHA obtained ownership of the land, farmhouse and buildings.

Through their local bank they were able to refinance a loan to buy back from the FHA the 40 acres that the farm house and buildings were on. They are currently renting from the FHA the rest of the farmland they previously owned.

"The hardest thing for me was to watch Glen try to figure out ways to save our farm. At the time, farm foreclosures were often contributed to mismanagement, and we were the first ones in our community to have a real financial crisis."

— Cathy Swartz

"We produce wheat, milo, hay, oats and have a 60 sow farrowing operation," Cathy said.

Glen said the higher hog prices helped them, but the lower prices didn't include much of the feeder market, which they sell in.

"We make more money off of our crops by running them through the livestock instead of just selling them," Glen said.

"Even though the higher hog prices helped us to make our loan payments, we also have the advantage of having a steady off-farm income," Cathy said.

Cathy works as the office manager of the K-State Farmers Assistance, Counseling and Training Service, and Glen works about seven to 10 days each month collecting bug traps from grain elevators for the Entomology Department. He also works about three days a month collecting grain samples from Kansas farms for the Department of Grain Science and Industry. In addition to Glen and Cathy's jobs, Jason collects eggs from the 30 hens on their farm, and sells them to people in their community. He uses the money he makes for toys and clothes that he really wants. Jason and Haley also help their dad with farm chores.

Both of Glen and Cathy's jobs help them to cope with stress and financial burdens.

"I think it really helps Glen to get away from our farm and to be around other people," Cathy said. "And, the people I work with are really neat and supportive."

Glen said he enjoys his job, but doesn't like to be away for more than a couple of days.

"I like to get away for awhile, but last year I was gone for several days in a row, and I didn't like that," he said.

The one thing about their jobs the Swartzes wish they could change is being away from their children.

"The only thing we really miss is spending more time with the kids," Cathy said. "It's hard, but we both have to work if we're going to keep up with the cost of living, operating expenses and paying off our loans."

A typical day at the Swartz's farm starts around 6 a.m. Cathy and Glen get the children up, dressed and fed. After breakfast, Casey is taken to the babysitter's home, and Jason and Haley either go to their grandmother's home, the babysitter's home or stay home with Glen until the bus comes. Glen then starts his day with hog chores and farm work.

After making sure the children are where they are supposed to be, Cathy drives about 25 miles to Manhattan to work. After a full day's work, she drives back to Alta Vista, picks up the children and heads home to start supper.

"Our days are pretty long, especially for the kids," Cathy said. "We get up at 6 a.m. and get home around 6 p.m. There's not much time for relaxing."

After supper, the children take baths and go to bed, and Glen and Cathy watch TV and do housework.

"We think we've managed pretty well," Cathy said. "We have had a major setback, but we're still making it."

Both Glen and Cathy think it is important for farm-help agencies to reach out to families in need.

"We think it's important that the agencies get out there and let the people know they're there," Cathy said. "We dealt with our problems on our own, but if I had known a number to call, I would have used it."

"We are young, and we have a lot of time ahead of us. I guess we are pretty fortunate, because some people don't."

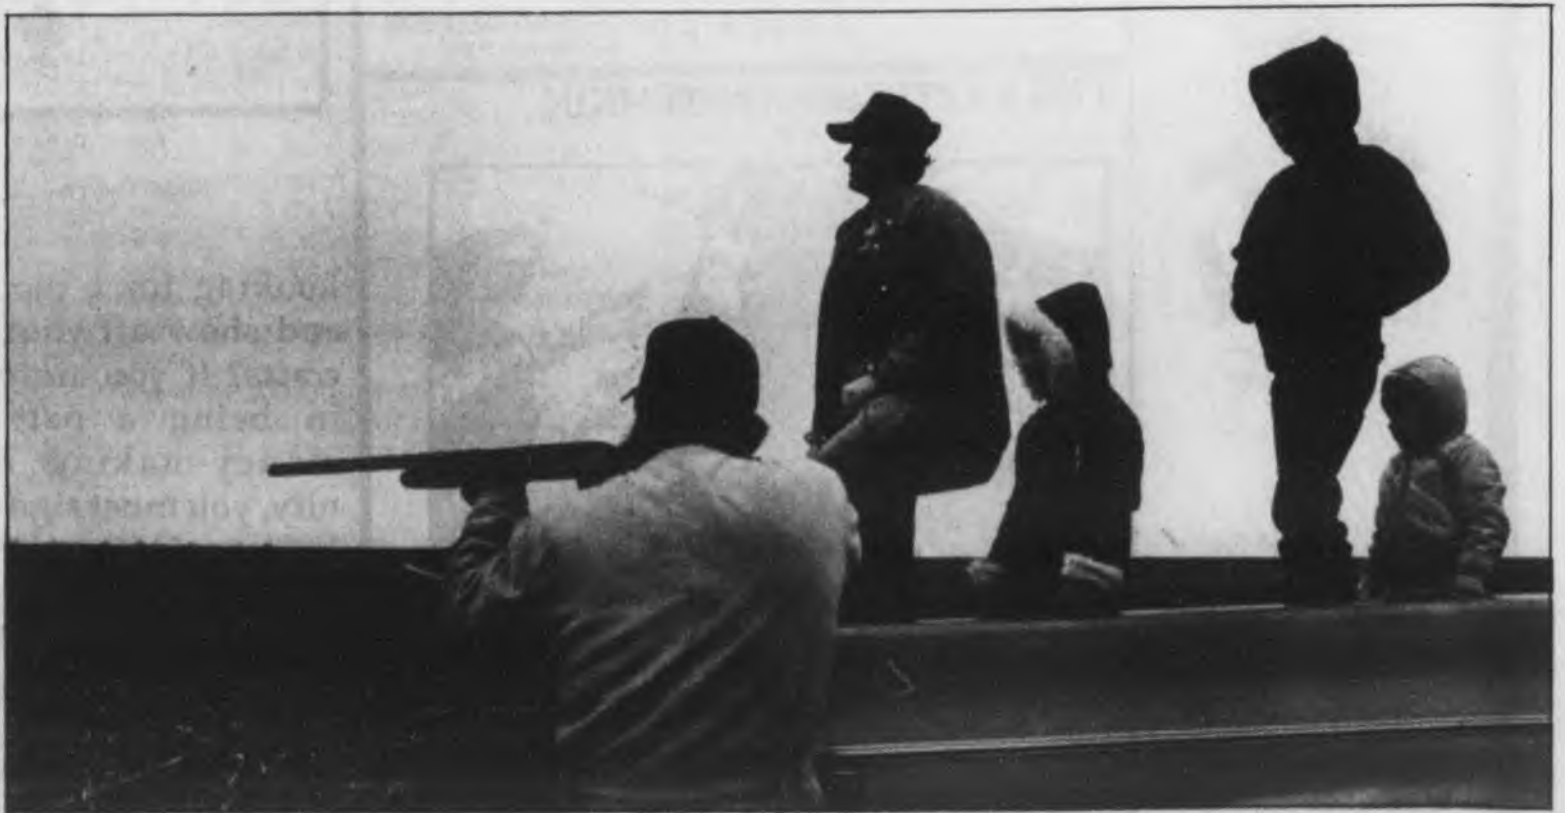

Cathy Swartz travels to Manhattan to work in the FACTS office on campus.

Glen said that he just tried to find a solution for their problem.

"I tried not to think too much about it, while trying to keep us all going," Glen said. "It was tough."

Cathy said their two youngest children were small enough that they weren't really aware of what was going on.

"Jason was the only one who really noticed anything, and he just thought his dad was too

Since the official prairie chicken season opened last Saturday, Glen Swartz gets a little extra practice shooting at some clay pigeons while neighbor Alex Bolinder and children Haley, Jason, and Casey watch from the back of the truck.

Students to enroll Monday

By The Collegian Staff

Early enrollment starts Nov. 16 and will run each day of classes until Dec. 4 in the basement of Farrell Library.

Graduate students and seniors start off the enrollment on Nov. 16, 17 and 18. Juniors can enroll beginning Nov. 18, sophomores will start Nov. 20, and freshmen will begin Nov. 24.

Students who miss their appointed date can enroll anytime after their scheduled appointment until Dec. 4.

To go through early enrollment, students must first pick up an enrollment form from their college. After meeting with their adviser, students should take the completed form to Farrell.

"The benefit of having early enrollment is students get a larger selection of classes to pick from," said Don Foster, University registrar.

"We (the administration) have the benefit of planning ahead based on the number of people who enroll in the different sections. We might need to shift some things around."

"The longest time (students) will wait in line will be around 15 minutes. It will take you about five minutes to finally get classes punched into the computer and a couple minutes to have the schedule printed up," he said.

Foster said students should go to Farrell as close to their appointed times as possible to help avoid backing up the system. He also recommended students bring a list of alternate classes in case their first choices are closed.

The line schedule states which classes require the instructor's permission to enroll. Foster said students should be sure to bring the permission slips for these classes to Farrell.

Soviet practice exposed

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Arbitrary diagnosis, abuse of power and bribery have tainted Soviet psychiatry, and a citizen can be found insane simply for not kowtowing to employers, a Soviet daily said Wednesday in a stunning expose.

"Psychiatric science and practice have long ago been shut off from openness by a high and solid fence," the Komsomolskaya Pravda newspaper said.

"Behind the fence, there is lawlessness," it added.

The paper's six-column article was the longest on psychiatric abuses to appear in the state-run press, and was clearly linked to the current campaign for "glasnost," or greater openness on social problems.

Due to the arbitrary way Soviet patients are now diagnosed, the paper said, "the same person can be recognized as a schizophrenic in Moscow, a psychopath in Leningrad and healthy in Kharkov."

Although Komsomolskaya

Pravda's article was groundbreaking by Soviet standards, it made no reference to charges by human rights activists and Western groups that psychiatric hospitals are used to warehouse political prisoners.

In the past, some of the most serious charges of abuse of psychiatry in the Soviet Union were leveled by psychiatrist Anatoly Koryagin, 48, who was sentenced to a labor camp in 1981 for his accusations. He was released last February and allowed to emigrate to Switzerland.

On Oct. 29, Koryagin addressed the Royal College of Psychiatrists in London and said the Soviet Union withdrew from the World Psychiatric Association in 1983 to avoid the humiliation of being suspended or expelled for using the science against political prisoners.

Vladimir Titov, a former political prisoner, was released from a psychiatric hospital last month. He told reporters Oct. 20 that at least a dozen hospitals throughout the country hold people convicted of political offenses.

Prisoners in such hospitals are subjected to heavy medication, poor food and unhealthy living conditions, Titov said.

Komsomolskaya Pravda said a 20-year-old Leningrad resident, Marina Pristavka, was forced into a mental hospital by the management of the factory where she worked, with the help of corrupt doctors.

Ms. Pristavka was condemned for her efforts to work honestly and her criticism of management for its indifference to the needs to workers, the paper said.

"She reads too much Marxist-Leninist literature," her trade union boss, Vladimir A. Kozlov, was quoted as saying.

According to Komsomolskaya Pravda, two schools of Soviet psychiatry exist, with the Leningrad school founded by Professor I.F. Sluchevsky giving a narrower definition of schizophrenia than the Moscow school.

Bribes have been accepted by psychiatrists to send criminals to hospitals.

Wolf Creek makes radioactive error

By The Associated Press

BURLINGTON — Radioactive metal ductwork from the reactor containment building at the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant was erroneously taken to the Coffey County landfill on Monday, officials announced Wednesday.

Ronn Smith, nuclear information supervisor at Wolf Creek, said the amount of radiation in the ductwork was extremely low and posed no threat to public health or safety.

The error was discovered late Monday evening when officials rechecked records, and all but a small portion of the ductwork was found and brought back to the plant on Tuesday, Smith said.

He said the level of radioactivity was about five microcuries, which he described as equivalent to what would be found in a half-ton of gypsum rock. A home smoke detector, he said, contains about two microcuries.

The radiation dose to a person standing three feet from the material would be about .001 millirem per hour, Smith said. He said the average Kansan receives about 10 times that amount, or .01 millirem per hour, from natural occurring background radiation.

Smith said about 66 square feet of scrap ductwork was taken to the landfill. When officials went back to retrieve it on Tuesday, they found all but six square feet.

The radioactivity in the portion that could not be found would be about one-fifth of the amount in a smoke detector, Smith said.

The recovered ductwork, Smith said, will be placed in an appropriate container and transferred to a storage facility for low level nuclear wastes.

Smith said the ductwork was in close proximity to the reactor and thus was exposed to radiation during its normal operation.

"The problem was sending it to the landfill," he said. "We send material to the landfill all the time. This should not have been."

"Essentially, it was just a mistake," Smith said. "Procedure wasn't followed when it should have been. The stuff was allowed to go out when it shouldn't have gone out."

Wolf Creek officials have notified the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, Coffey County and the state, Smith said.

Milk consumption may cause cholesterol dietary problems

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Almost two-thirds of white children and three-quarters of black children consumed too much cholesterol in their diets, suggesting they may be at risk for heart disease later in life, a study says.

"The basis of the racial difference in cholesterol intake may be due to the type of milk introduced during infancy," the study's authors wrote in a supplement to the November issue of Pediatrics, journal of the suburban Chicago-based American Academy of Pediatrics.

White children generally drank more cow's milk than blacks, most of whom at 6 months and 1 year of age consumed a milk-based formula, the researchers found.

Early identification of people at risk for heart disease may eventually lead to a better approach to prevention, the authors wrote.

"Diet has been recognized as an important environmental determinant of cardiovascular disease risk. Consequently, alteration of eating habits in early childhood may delay or prevent cardiovascular disease development," they wrote.

The findings stem from an ongoing study of 440 infants from birth through age 7 in Bogalusa, La., a biracial community outside New Orleans.

Dietary patterns were examined in a smaller sample of children aged 6 months, with follow-ups at age 1 and at yearly intervals up to age 4.

By age 2, most of the children studied were exceeding the recommended daily intake of cholesterol, a fatty substance found in certain foods and believed to be a factor in the development of heart disease.

Sixty-two percent of the white children studied and 76 percent of the blacks had cholesterol intakes that exceeded the 300 milligrams-per-day recommendation of the American Heart Association.

Outside hitter Lynda Harshbarger has been fighting for one of the two starting spots at the position with teammates Shawnee Call and Mary Kinsey. Coach Scott Nelson said Harshbarger is one of the most improved players on the team this year.

Battling for position inspires Harshbarger

By Chase Clark
Sports Writer

Playing on the opposite side of the net from K-State volleyball star Shawnee Call is tough enough for opposing teams. But battling for playing time against Call may be even tougher.

That hasn't stopped K-State sophomore outside hitter Lynda Harshbarger. She's been fighting for one of the two starting positions at outside hitter with teammates Call and Mary Kinsey. Coach Scott Nelson said Lynda has been keeping pace with them.

"Lynda plays the same position as Mary Kinsey and Shawnee Call," Nelson said. "The three of them have been battling all year for starting positions and really all three of them have been playing very well. Lynda held down a starting position...through the first third of the season, lost it in the middle and has recaptured it now.

"She's really one of the most improved players on our team this year. Last year, as a freshman, she was fairly inconsistent. This year, her consistency is much better. I think she's really contributing quite a bit to our team. It's made my job tougher trying to figure out who's been playing the best of those three. But that's a good problem to have and I'll gladly have it," Nelson said.

Another player might find it very frustrating not knowing if she is going to be starting or playing a lot from one match to the next; but not Harshbarger. She takes it all in stride and just makes the best out of the situation.

"It's been tough not knowing," Harshbarger said. "But when I do get to play, I just try and take advantage of it. If Mary (Kinsey) is in there, I know she's going to be doing a good job and if I'm in there I know I can do it, so it really doesn't matter who's in there.

"I think (the competition for playing time) really helps me, because I know I have to fight to keep my position and to keep playing. So when I'm in there I really have to concentrate and do the things I know how to do, or else I'll probably be coming out of the game," she said.

Looking at her statistics, it appears she hasn't been substituted for too much this year. She is third on the team with 152 kills. Her hitting percentage is .223 and she has 377 attacks. She has collected 26 service aces and is fifth on the team with 112 digs this season.

Nelson is surprised at how consistently Harshbarger has been playing this year. He expected her to get more playing time this season, but didn't expect she would have improved so much from last year. He said he feels good about her performance so far in the tough outside hitter position.

"I call on the two people that play that left side hitting position to pass all of the serves of an opponent, to hit 60 to 70 percent of all of our sets and to dig," Nelson said. "Usually they're our top defensive players, because they're on the opponent's primary power angle on defense. Lynda really has done a good job for us this year in that position."

But just because Nelson is impressed, it doesn't mean Harshbarger is satisfied with her performances yet.

"I just want to go in there and keep improving," Harshbarger said. "I think I still have a long way to go as a player in all areas — passing, serving and hitting. I think I have a long way to go before I reach my peak."

"I feel like we are doing really well," Harshbarger said. "We've improved so much from last year. It's just so much more of a team effort. I don't think we've reached our peak yet as a team."

"I think we still have a lot of improving to do and if we come out and practice every day and just stay intense, I think we're going to get really good (in time for) the Big Eight (Tournament)."

Regular season closes

K-State will wrap up its regular season schedule this weekend, as it hosts the University of Missouri at 7:30 p.m. Friday. On Sunday, the University of Oklahoma Sooners visit Manhattan for a 1:30 p.m. start.

"This is a big weekend for us," Nelson said. "We need to repeat with a win over Missouri and play much better than we did in our first match with OU. With the conference tournament coming up, I sure would like to see us have a good weekend."

K-State, 17-8 overall and 5-5 in Big Eight Conference play, won a four-game match over Missouri earlier this season in Columbia. The Tigers are 7-20 overall and 0-10 in conference play. Leading the Tiger attack is middle hitter Stacy Young, with a .261 hitting percentage and outside hitter Sharon Zachringer at .257.

Oklahoma, 21-7 overall and 8-2 in the Big Eight, defeated K-State in three games earlier this year at Norman. Leading Oklahoma is Trenell Carter, last week's conference player of the week. She leads the Sooners in kills with 248.

Cy Young comes to visit Clemens again

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Roger Clemens of the Boston Red Sox became the first American League pitcher in more than a decade to win consecutive Cy Young awards, claiming the 1987 trophy on Wednesday despite a spring training holdout and a 4-6 start.

Clemens, 20-9 with 256 strikeouts in 281½ innings this year, received 21 of 28 first-place votes and 124 points in balloting by a panel of Baseball Writers Association of America members. Jimmy Key of Toronto, 17-8 with a league-leading earned run average of 2.76, had four first-place votes and 64 points to finish a distant second.

Clemens, who had the league's third-best ERA of 2.97, was the only pitcher in either league whose name appeared on each ballot. Steve Bedrosian, the Philadelphia Phillies reliever, won the National League Cy Young award in a close battle with Rick Sutcliffe of Chicago and Rick Reuschel of San Francisco.

The last American League pitcher to win consecutive Cy Youngs was Jim Palmer of the Baltimore Orioles in 1975-76. Denny McLain won the AL Cy Young in 1968 and shared it with Mike Cuellar the following year.

Clemens became only the third American League pitcher to win a Cy Young for a team placed as low as fifth. Dean Chance with the 1964 California Angels and Gaylord Perry with the 1972 Cleveland Indians also won the award with fifth-place teams.

Following Key in the balloting were Dave Stewart of Oakland, 32 points; Doyle Alexander of Detroit, 8; Mark Langston of Seattle, 7; Ted Higuera of Milwaukee and Frank Viola of Minnesota, 5 each; Jeff Reardon of Minnesota, 4, and Jack Morris of Detroit, 3.

Stewart, at 20-13 the only other 20-game winner in the league besides Clemens, had two first-place votes, and Alexander had the other.

Balloting is done by a panel comprised of two BBWAA members from each league city.

Cyclones must play up to potential

(senior forward Jeff Grayer) the second game of the season. He played the entire year with a chipped bone in his ankle and a bad knee. Now his bone chip has been removed, his knee is well and he's 100 percent again," Orr said.

JOHNNY ORR... ready to improve.

This season should be a complete turnaround of last season, though, if Orr gets his way. Grayer is healthy again and should be the team force Orr has always thought he was capable of being. Add to that seven new players, four freshmen and three transfers, who should really contribute to the team and fill the weak spots.

"It's the same Johnny Orr type of ball club...running and pressuring all over the floor," senior guard Gary Thompkins said. "The main difference is we have a lot of young guys that can play and our depth is a lot stronger than it has been in the past."

Everything looks good on paper, but the question is whether Orr can get them to play strongly as a team from start to finish. The University of Kansas realized that when it went into a late season slump and saw the University of Missouri sneak up and take the conference crown before anyone knew what had happened.

"I'm looking forward to this season," Orr said. "I'm excited about this team of mine. We're going to press all the time and up-tempo the game as much as we possibly can. We have extreme quickness. This is the fastest team I've had since 1976. I like to play that way. If we can just get them to throw the ball to our guys that are ready instead of the other guys, we'll be OK."

Comparing this year's squad to his 1976 team when he coached at the University of Michigan is quite a comparison. That team placed second to the University of Indiana in the NCAA Tournament. His postseason experience doesn't stop there, though. At Iowa State, Orr has taken teams into the NCAA Tournament three of the last four years.

For Iowa State to succeed, Grayer must step forward as the team leader and guide both the experienced veterans and the newcomers. Fortunately for Orr, it's a position Grayer is ready to fill.

"I'm looking forward to the challenge," Grayer said. "I'm ready to step forward as a leader. Last year, I thought we had leadership-caliber guys who could step up there, but we just weren't mentally in the game. We didn't want to play. Everyone wanted to live off the year before."

But Grayer said things have changed this year and the team's attitude has improved tremendously. He also said everyone is working harder in practice and helping each other out.

If Grayer's performance is a main key to the Cyclones' play this season, then it appears Orr has very little to worry about.

"Last year Jeff Grayer still scored 600 points for us and he couldn't even run," Orr said. "He looks better this year than he's ever looked. I think if he can come back and play like he did two years ago, he'll once again be one of the great players in the country."

It takes more than one star player to make a team. Iowa State team co-captain Thompkins and junior forward Elmer Robinson are going to have to play better, because Grayer

Kruger's hometown sees 'Cats

In front of a capacity crowd of 1,000 people, Head Coach Lon Kruger and his K-State basketball team returned to Kruger's hometown of Silver Lake and played a hard-fought pre-season intrasquad scrimmage Wednesday night.

Although it probably won't be the biggest crowd the Wildcats perform for this year, Kruger said his players really enjoyed playing in the Silver Lake High School gymnasium.

"It was great to come back home and we really appreciate the tremendous turnout," Kruger said, of the support shown by the northeast Kansas community with a population of just over 1,000 people. "The players really got a kick out of the environment."

In the scrimmage, the white squad defeated the purple squad 61-60. The scrimmage was divided into three 10-minute periods. High scorer for the white team was Mitch Richmond, with 18 points, while Fred McCoy paced the purple unit with 19 points. Also scoring in double figures were Charles Bledsoe with 13 and Mark Dobbins with 10 for the white team, and Carlos Diggins with 15, Walter Wright with 12 and Fabio de Almeida with 10 for the purple squad.

Netters begin regional play

The K-State women's tennis team will be testing its talents against several teams this weekend in the Rolex I.T.C.A. Regional Championship at the Wichita State University.

Highlighting the list of schools competing is Brigham Young University — a Top 10 tennis school — along with the University of Utah and the University of New Mexico.

The tournament begins Friday at 9 a.m. and concludes Sunday. The finalists in singles and doubles play will then advance to the nationals at Minneapolis, Minn.

This weekend K-State will take six players — the most the Wildcats have taken to regional action in three years. These six players will be competing on an individual level with no team standings kept.

"This tournament is a reward and is a great opportunity for the players," Head Coach Steve Bietau said. "It's a chance for the players to see how they compare against the best competition in the country."

Cubs rehire Jim Frey as VP

Jim Frey, fired 17 months ago as the field manager of the Chicago Cubs, Wednesday was handed the reins to run the team's entire organization.

Frey, who managed the Cubs to the National League East title in 1984, was appointed executive vice president and director of baseball operations by John Madigan, vice president of Tribune Co., which owns the team.

The move came almost two weeks after Dallas Green resigned as general manager. Ironically, it was Green who had hired Frey as field manager in 1984 and fired him in June of 1986.

'Baby' gets thumbs up

By Gary Leffler
Collegian Reviewer

Theoretically, it is impossible for anyone to have a full, satisfying personal life while holding a position as a powerful, hard working New York executive. At least, this is the theory one character puts forward in the film "Baby Boom." Diane Keaton, however, sets out to prove this theory wrong.

"Baby Boom" is a story about parenthood and yuppie-hood and the nearly impossible combination of the two. It examines and pokes fun at the life of a yuppie while simultaneously turning this life upside down by adding an unexpected bundle of joy.

Movie Review

Diane Keaton plays J.C. Wyatt, a powerful New York advertising executive. She is called the "Tiger Lady" for her tenacity and assertiveness. As the film opens, she is having a power lunch with her boss during which she is offered a partnership in the firm.

J.C. celebrates that evening with Steve, her boyfriend, near-fiancee and time share partner, played by Harold Ramis. Their celebration is brief, though, as they quickly return to their respective work loads — their papers spread over the pin-striped bed sheets.

However, that night J.C. receives an overseas phone call informing her that her mother's cousin's father's son has died in an auto accident with his wife and J.C. is the sole beneficiary in their will. Shockingly enough, J.C. has inherited little Elizabeth, their daughter.

From here, "Baby Boom" turns the world of high-powered business upside down as J.C. attempts to juggle her new job and her new baby, as well as her briefcase and a box of disposable diapers. The joys of parenthood and the joys of business are interwoven in a funny script that attempts to answer the question of whether you can indeed have it all.

Diane Keaton portrays J.C. Wyatt with a marvelous mixture of comic timing and dramatic concern over her love for Elizabeth. Keaton avoids becoming cliché and balances the script's heavy demands on her character with all the grace of the accomplished actress she is.

Her initial attempt at carrying a baby, a briefcase, a box of diapers and her shoulder bag defines her character's struggle. J.C. desperately clutches the briefcase handle while Elizabeth gets lugged around like a sack of potatoes, hanging upside down as they both whirl through a revolving door.

Harold Ramis turns in a suitably snobbish and selfish portrayal of Steve. His sense of fatherhood is buried deeply beneath his pinstripes and designer specs.

Sam Shepard also puts in a strong portrayal as a country doctor. As usual, his portrayal is comfortable, natural and fit in so well with the others that he becomes the accent that his character is intended to be without dominating the scenes.

Generally, "Baby Boom" is able to place the accents and subtleties in all the right places. The film strikes a good balance between the dramatics of Madison Avenue and the humor of feeding a baby linguini or finding the most "distinguished" preschool for the child to attend (thus insuring entrance to all the best colleges).

There are a few too many shots that provoke the endearing "ooooohhh" or "aaaaahhh" from the audience, but such is to be expected when one of the main characters is an 18-month-old child.

In fact, I was actually impressed that the director saw fit not to overwhelm the audience with the sentimentality of a baby. Elizabeth could have easily become as annoying as Mike The Dog in "Down and Out in Beverly Hills." But instead of showcasing Elizabeth's chubby face and curly hair, she is shown precisely when plot dictated her presence or when a point was being made about parenthood versus the workplace.

If you find cute babies and cooing audiences offensive, then perhaps "Baby Boom" is not for you. But if you want to be entertained by a fine actress and a good, well-paced story line, then "Baby Boom" is as desirable as a tax-free municipal bond or a new BMW.

Five halls open during break

By The Collegian Staff

Full residence halls will not cause a change in policy for students who must stay on campus over Thanksgiving break.

Each semester, 150 to 175 students remain on campus during holiday breaks, said Bob Felde, assistant director of housing.

A particular hall is kept open, he said, when a high percent of its residents will be staying. Other students are moved into empty rooms for the holidays.

"Some halls just have a natural concentration of students who need to stay," he said. "Edwards has about 60 signed up this year. They have a high percent of graduate and international students who tend to be more independent — or can't fly home to Korea or wherever for break."

Felde said five residence halls will be open during Thanksgiving. This is the most halls he has ever kept open during the break.

About 20 students who live in other halls will be transferred to vacant spaces in the open halls.

Felde said some students will be moved to the few empty rooms remaining in the halls. Others will be moved into rooms that are contracted to two people but one person has moved out.

Some students, who missed the sign-up deadline, will be turned away because of the lack of available rooms. He said this is the first time students have been turned down.

Felde said staff members have been hired to provide 24-hour service to students staying in the halls.

"Some years we make money, some years we don't. We just try to break even. We feel we're providing a pretty good service," he said.

Russian overthrow portrayed in film

By Ann Iseman
Collegian Reporter

The common people fighting back. Serge Eisenstein's classic silent film "The Battleship Potemkin" gives the viewer a firsthand look at how the Russian people stood up to the tyrants who were ruling Russia in 1905.

Although Eisenstein was assigned by the Soviet Union to re-create the revolution of 1905 on film, he instead focused on just one incident of the revolution.

Movie Review

The significance of this one incident and Eisenstein's dramatic portrayal of it helps the viewer understand the entire revolution and why the people revolted.

The crew of the Battleship Potemkin, angry at the inhumane conditions aboard the ship, threw the officers overboard and with a "fraternal hurrah," took control of the Potemkin.

Hearing of the revolt on the Potemkin, the people of nearby Odessa turned out to support the sailors and give them food, water and coal.

With Eisenstein's creative use of mounting — the interlacing of close-ups, side views, top views and bottom views — the film invites viewers to feel the movement of the people and the machines, to become physically involved in the action of the film.

The dramatic scene on the Odessa steps is the most talked-about sequence in the movie. The soldiers passionately march down the steps shooting into a crowd of men, women and children.

Most of the people flee, many are shot in the back and a few bravely cry out for the soldiers to stop shooting. Their cries have no effect as the soldiers keep marching forward, without pausing, without even a second look at the mother carrying her dead child or the baby carriage tumbling down the steps.

Eisenstein's film is propaganda. The Soviet Union even put the Black Sea fleet at Eisenstein's disposal, and the film deliberately portrayed the event as an "...episode of revolutionary heroism calculated to electrify the masses," Eisenstein wrote in 1927.

Despite its propagandizing, the film was innovative at the time it was filmed and Eisenstein captured the senseless treatment of the people by the rulers.

Despite the massacre of the people of Odessa, the film ended with a positive note for the revolution. The Potemkin was cheered on by the soldiers of the opposing naval ships while the officers helplessly watched.

FBI agents abused suspect, lawyer says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Two FBI agents deliberately slammed a Lebanese terrorist suspect to the deck of a yacht, breaking his wrists, and then ignored his complaints of pain during four days of interrogation, a defense lawyer charged in court papers.

The lawyer also accused the FBI of sedating and tying up the suspect, Fawaz Younis, for a 15-hour flight to Washington after his arrest in the Mediterranean on Sept. 13.

Younis, charged with participating in the 1985 hijacking of a Jordanian airliner, was arrested after he was lured aboard the FBI-rented yacht.

Two agents "walked on either side of him, his arms were grabbed and he was thrown — face down — to the deck of the vessel," said defense lawyer Francis D. Carter in the court documents filed late Tuesday. Younis suffered facial cuts and broke his wrists when he thrust out his arms to cushion the fall, Carter said.

The FBI is conducting an internal investigation into the circumstances surrounding the injuries, according to sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

FBI spokesman Susan Schnitzer declined to comment on the defense allegations. "We will comment on it in a proper forum, which will be through our own filing."

The lawyer said the FBI deliberately ignored Younis' complaints of pain during four days of questioning aboard a U.S. Navy vessel that slowly plied the Mediterranean from its initial position near Cyprus to waters off Corsica.

Younis was convinced to board the yacht by Jamal Hamdan, a friend who promised he could meet an influential Beirut businessman, the defense said.

The Lebanese suspect was transferred to the Navy ammunition vessel positioned near the yacht and kept aboard the ship only for interrogation, Carter said. The FBI "protracted the time before he was surrendered to the court, knowing the defendant was in pain from his broken wrists and ill from seasickness," the lawyer said.

The defense charged that ice was the only medical treatment Younis received aboard ship for his fractured wrists.

On Sept. 17, Younis was flown by helicopter to an aircraft carrier and transferred to a military aircraft that brought him to Washington. Before the helicopter flight, Younis was injected with a sedative and bound so that he could not move his arms and feet, the defense charged.

During the 15-hour flight to Washington, Younis lay immobilized and "was not given solid food or allowed to attend to his bodily functions," Carter charged.

Younis, a former Shiite militiaman from Beirut, is charged with participating with four other unnamed co-conspirators who used high-powered rifles to seize a Jordanian airliner on June 11, 1985.

"Gary Thompson and Elmer Robinson have to come on and return to the form they were two years ago," he said. "Gary went to China with the Big Eight (Select) team and is playing better than he did a year ago. Elmer is down in weight to 219 pounds. If he doesn't sustain any injuries he'll be OK."

Depending on which preseason poll you read, Iowa State is ranked either fourth or fifth in the conference — a position which is just below where Orr feels his team could finish.

"We're hoping we can get in there somewhere in the first division," Orr said. "We'll be hard to beat in Ames, Iowa. It's just a question if we can win any games on the road."

"The Big Eight is going to have a tremendous year," Orr said. "Missouri has to be the favorite because they won it last year. But you look at the games and they won a lot of close games. They'll have to fight their hearts out to repeat. I think the league from top to bottom is going to be very good."

Lubbers said he will work to improve Farrell Library during his presidency. Improving communication between students and student government through an "open forum" will be another of his goals. "The open forum is where student government leaders go and talk to students and find out about their concerns," Lubbers said.

"That's one thing I'll accomplish," he said.

Lubbers would not speculate, however, on the idea of asking Taylor to serve on his cabinet.

Shortly after being told of his victory, Lubbers received a phone call from Taylor.

"I can honestly say I've had a lot of fun working with you," Lubbers told Taylor.

In contrast, the lobby of the Delta Sigma Phi house was very quiet when Jack Taylor received the election results over the phone.

"I lost," Taylor said, "764 to 900 and something. I lost."

Taylor said he and his supporters put many hours into the campaign, and although he was not the winner, he is still planning to accomplish some of his goals.

"There are some things I'm interested in doing, things I can carry on. I want to do as much as I can to help Troy out, to bring K-State to being a better place," Taylor said.

"This is the time now to unite, to get together, get behind Troy to help him out and give him all the support he deserves," he continued.

Taylor said he had $100 remaining of the $665.65 limit set for candidates in the general election. Twenty dollars remained from the $166.41 allowed for expenses for the run-off election.

Lubbers spent less, however, using approximately $540 in the general election, and only $43 in the run-off.

Two local lottery winners gain $5,000

It was only the first day of the Kansas Lottery, but for Jeff Rider, Grandview Plaza, and Frank Stewart, Junction City, one day was all it took.

Both Rider and Stewart won $5,000 instantly in the Up and Away scratch-off game.

Rider is assistant police chief of Grandview Plaza.

He was taking a break during his 12-hour shift about 12:05 a.m. when he stopped at Derby Gas, Junction City, for gas. He purchased 15 tickets at the station and received a free one from the station.

Of the 16 tickets, Rider said the last one he scratched off contained the $5,000 prize. "I was just out of it," he said. "The trooper ahead of me bought four. If he had bought five, he would have won."

"It was a surprise. I hadn't expected anything," he added.

The remainder of Rider's shift was calm and he was "lucky nothing major happened, or it would have put a damper on it."

"I wanted to go out and party tonight, but I'm too tired," Rider said.

"I can't think of a nicer person to have this happen to," said Thelma Lindgren, city clerk of Grandview Plaza. "Jeff is such a generous kid."

Rider said he was taking his ticket to Topeka. See WINNERS, Page 10

U.S. trade deficit brighter, lowers to $14.1 billion

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's trade deficit eased to $14.1 billion in September, the government reported Thursday in statistics that suggested the U.S. import-export picture was brightening even before the stock market crash.

The report, marking the lowest trade shortfall in four months, touched off a rally in the financial markets.

The Commerce Department said the merchandise trade deficit, the gap between imports and exports, decreased by a strong $1.6 billion in September from the $15.7 billion level of August.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed up 61.01 points while the dollar, which had sunk to new 40-year lows earlier in the week, also rallied in New York, rising nearly 1 yen in value to 135.83 yen. It also was sharply higher against European currencies.

Although much of the trade improvement came from a decline in oil imports, imports of manufactured goods also fell while exports of U.S.-made products rose sharply.

Economists took this as a sign that the long-awaited turnaround in trade accounts from a declining dollar may have finally begun, and that it started weeks before the Oct. 19 stock market collapse.

A lower-valued dollar makes imports more expensive and U.S. goods more competitive abroad. However, in the past the decline in the dollar against other major currencies — more than 40 percent since mid-1985 — had shown little direct impact on the monthly trade figures.

"Two and a half years after the dollar peaked, we are finally seeing an effect on both imports and exports," said Robert Wescott, chief economist for Alphametrics, a Philadelphia forecasting service.

Last month's disappointing report on the August trade deficit, which showed a smaller-than-anticipated improvement from the $16.5 billion shortfall in July, has been widely cited as one of the factors that helped trigger the stock market collapse.

White House spokesman Martin Fitzwater said the new figures were "especially encouraging" because they included a gain in the export of manufactured goods. "These numbers should be received well," he said.

The trade report, the best since a $14.0 billion deficit in May, showed an improvement with all of the nation's major trading partners except Canada.

Imports declined to $35.1 billion from $35.9 billion in August, while exports rose over the same period from $20.2 billion to $21 billion.

Imports of petroleum products dropped to $3.9 billion from $4.7 billion in August. Oil prices are not directly affected by changes in the value of the dollar because oil is sold in international markets for dollars.

But imports of manufactured goods, which are sensitive to dollar fluctuations, fell to $26.6 billion, down from $26.9 billion. Exports of U.S.-manufactured goods, meanwhile, were up $1.1 billion to $14.8 billion.

Analysts cautioned against reading too much into a single month's figures. And, for the first nine months of 1987, the trade deficit was still amassing at an annual rate of $166.9 billion.

Positive support for Kennedy from conservative senators

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Anthony M. Kennedy won words of support from former opponent Jesse Helms Thursday in a day of White House peacemaking sessions free of the bitterness that followed President Reagan's previous two nominations.

"I think he'll make a fine member of the Supreme Court," Helms, R-N.C., an outspoken member of the Senate's conservative wing, told reporters after meeting separately with Reagan and with the federal appellate judge. However, a spokeswoman said Helms wouldn't make a decision until after confirmation hearings.

Late last month, after the Senate voted down Reagan nominee Robert H. Bork, Kennedy was considered the front-runner for the court vacancy until Helms said there was no way he would support a Kennedy nomination and other conservatives also indicated displeasure. Reagan then nominated Douglas H. Ginsburg, who withdrew last weekend after admitting past marijuana use.

The president also met with Democrat Joseph R. Biden Jr., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, as Kennedy made courtesy calls on senators, many of whom have reacted favorably but cautiously to the nomination.

Biden, D-Del., said Reagan asked that confirmation hearings begin "as soon as possible." Describing the talks at a news conference, Biden said, "I know of no one who wants to move this slowly." And he pronounced Kennedy's prospects as "good, based on what we've read and heard so far."

Biden, whose committee will consider Kennedy's nomination before the matter goes to the full Senate, said he promised he would meet with leaders of both parties and with Reagan's chief of staff, Howard H. Baker Jr., "to see if we can come up with a date" to begin hearings.

Helms said his meeting with Kennedy "went just fine. He's a very impressive gentleman. I was pleased with what I heard."

Reagan said Wednesday he intended to nominate Kennedy, 51, of Sacramento, Calif.

The Judiciary Committee's top-ranking Republican, Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, also took part in the White House meetings. He told reporters conservatives would back Kennedy, adding, "You're not going to get anybody who will please everybody."

On Capitol Hill, during a meeting with Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole and other GOP senators, Kennedy, 51, said, "I like this; it's been wonderful."

"If anyone has a chance to be confirmed, he does," Thurmond said of Kennedy before the White House meeting.

He urged confirmation by Christmas, but Biden indicated there would be no vote before the Senate returns early next year from its yearend recess.

Reagan, in introducing Kennedy at the White House on Wednesday, adopted an apologetic tone in regard to the contentious previous nominations and praised his new nominee as a "courageous, tough but fair jurist."

K-State participates in nationwide study; turnout may affect ability to score results

By Jan Schwartz
Collegian Reporter

Approximately 550 freshmen and juniors were sent letters inviting them to participate in a national study to assess some of the outcomes of a college education.

The students received a letter from the K-State Office of Provost offering them the opportunity to represent the University and answer questions on a new test, the Academic Profile, developed by Princeton's Educational Testing Service.

Don Hoyt, director of planning and evaluation services, said colleges across the country received invitations to be a part of the study.

Each school wanting to participate had to send in a design describing to whom the test would be administered and how its effectiveness could be judged. The design had to be accepted by the testing service in order for the college to become an aggregate of the study.

Tests determine value of college education

"The purpose of the test is to monitor and evaluate the strength of the programs offered at K-State," Hoyt said. "We will be able to compare our results with a number of other institutions across the country."

Hoyt said freshmen and juniors were chosen to take the test because they wanted to contrast the impact of two years of college on test scores.

Freshmen and juniors were further divided on the basis of curriculum interests, he said. Curriculum is divided into soft, hard, pure and applied courses. Each of the colleges within the University have been classified accordingly.

The sample of people qualifying to take the test was reduced further with the stipulation the person must be a native of Kansas. The remaining freshmen and juniors eligible were then picked randomly by a computer.

Hoyt said as an incentive to spending 1½ hours taking the test, the KSU Foundation will draw names of the volunteers who participated and award the winner a check for $250 dollars.

Students are tested over four basic skills: reading, writing, use of mathematical data and critical thinking. The test also covers background knowledge in the natural sciences, social sciences and humanities, he said.

"The test appears to have promise in evaluating the two features of liberal education," Hoyt said. "It measures educational skills and the breadth of knowledge or understanding."

Hoyt said response has been poor and the results will likely be distorted because there was not a good level of participation.

"Acceptance has been less than 50 percent," Hoyt said. "It will have a serious effect on our ability to evaluate the results."

The test results will be reported to the Board of Regents, he said, and may have an indirect effect on the "Margin of Excellence" plan.

"If they're to provide additional funding, we need to provide additional measures of accountability," Hoyt said.

The scheduled testing sessions began Nov. 2 and will continue through today.

Iran vows war will continue

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iraq claimed its warplanes hit another tanker in the Persian Gulf on Thursday and Iran responded to Arab leaders' calls for a cease-fire by vowing the war would continue until "the aggressor" Iraq is defeated.

Iran's prime minister, Hussein Musavi, denounced an Arab League summit in Jordan as a "defeat for the Arabs, because its decisions were dictated by the United States."

Iran also announced its gunboats intercepted and searched eight unidentified "foreign" cargo ships and oil tankers in the Strait of Hormuz on Wednesday and Thursday but let them go after no Iraq-bound cargo was found aboard.

Snowstorms kill 18 in Tibet

BEIJING, China— Autumn snowstorms have killed 18 people and 8,000 head of livestock in Tibet, the official Xinhua News Agency said Thursday.

Some herdsmen and livestock remain stranded, although regional authorities have rushed in large supplies of food and fuel, the report said.

It said that since mid-October, snowstorms hit eight counties in southwest Tibet near the border with Nepal. Heavy snows this early in the year are rare.

More than 200 foreign travelers along the road from Lhasa, Tibet's capital, to Katmandu, Nepal, were trapped by an Oct. 19-21 storm. About 150 spent six nights in buses snowbound at a 17,000-foot-high pass. All eventually were rescued.

Alzheimer's may begin early

WASHINGTON — Alzheimer's disease, a disease of mental decline, usually is diagnosed among the elderly, but a Florida researcher says his studies with laboratory rats show the process may start a decade before symptoms appear.

Gary W. Arendash, a scientist at the University of South Florida, said the long-term effect of chemical lesions on specific brain sites in laboratory rats resulted in symptoms that mimic those of Alzheimer's disease in humans.

He said some of the treated rats were killed and their brains showed changes five months after receiving the lesions. Because of their compressed life expectancy when compared to humans, he said the five months is equivalent to about a decade in a human life.

"This may suggest that the destructive changes in Alzheimer's may be under way for perhaps a decade before memory loss or other symptoms are evident," Arendash said.

Convict can't get into prison

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — He tried twice, but couldn't get past the front door — of the Texas Department of Corrections. "This thing's like making hotel reservations," said State District Judge Woody Densen. "But he's going to try again."

Wayne Fletcher Pratt, 19, convicted of aggravated assault and sentenced to two years prison, tried to turn himself in to prison officials Sept. 30. He was turned away because he didn't have an appointment. He couldn't get in Friday because he arrived too late.

Prison spokesman Charles Brown said the TDC has changed its policy from open admission to one in which inmates are scheduled for admission.

Pratt is now scheduled to turn himself in on Dec. 3.

North Pole to South Pole

DULUTH, Minn. — Will Steger, who reached the North Pole last May, says he's planning a trek across Antarctica to the South Pole.

"We'll start working on the South Pole right after Christmas," Steger, 43, said Wednesday as he autographed 5,000 copies of his book detailing his expedition's 55-day dogsled journey.

Paul Schurke, who traveled with Steger, is co-author. Steger has teamed with French explorer Jean-Louis Etienne and Soviet scientist Viktor Boyarsky to lead the Trans-Antarctica International Expedition, a 5,000-mile, six-month crossing of the Earth's seventh continent.

"North to the Pole" tells of the 1,500-mile polar expedition, which culminated May 1, 1986, when Steger, four other men, one woman and 20 dogs reached the North Pole.

Boy dies from gunshot wound

PARSONS — Jared Kinsch, 7, died Wednesday from an apparent accidental gunshot wound to the head, officials said.

Dr. Stan Handshy, the Labette County coroner, pronounced him dead at the scene after authorities were called to a local residence late Wednesday afternoon.

Assistant Police Chief Gary Baldwin said it was unclear who placed the call to the police department, nor had it been determined why the boy was at the home.

"It is not clear at this point if he was there to be with a babysitter or if he was just there playing after school," Baldwin said.

Senate decides fees for renovation, construction will need vote to pass

By Brad Fanshier
Collegian Reporter

Any future creation of student fees for the construction or renovation of K-State buildings or facilities will first require a student referendum, the Student Senate decided in its meeting Thursday in the Union Big Eight Room.

Senate passed a constitutional revision which calls for a binding student referendum before committing student money to future construction projects.

The bill, co-sponsored by Arts and Sciences senator Dan Owens, senior in economics, and graduate school senator Justin Sanders, graduate in physics, will affect projects similar to the Holton Hall renovation project, for which no referendum was held. A referendum will require passage by two-thirds of those voting if less than one-third of the student population votes. If more than one-third of the students vote, a simple majority will be required.

Both Owens and Sanders felt there was a strong need for the bill.

"It's been something that has been needed for a long time," Sanders said. "The 1982 senate didn't do it (hold a referendum on Holton Hall) and I think that was a major flaw."

Owens added that the bill was a positive step in Senate use of student fees which will be collected several years after the initiation of a project. "What we accomplished (in the wake of the Holton vote) was we raised the level of consciousness of the senators (on funding matters)," Owens said.

Both senators wanted to make sure the senate understood the students' priorities before making major spending decisions.

"We need to go in there with both eyes open," Sanders said.

Senate also heard first reading of a resolution to recommend naming the new biochemistry building after former University president Thomas E.

Will. Will is the only president, other than Duane Acker, who is not honored by a campus building, said Kirk Caraway, senior in political science and sponsor of the resolution.

The Senate was also visited by Provost James Coffman. He told the senators about the open admissions policy and the "Margin of Excellence" program. Coffman was questioned about student input being sought on the allocation of the MOE funds.

Senator seeks view on new health plan

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Senate Minority Leader Michael Johnston, D-Parsons, is seeking an opinion from Kansas Attorney General Robert T. Stephan about the new health plan for state employees.

The new Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas plan, which becomes effective Jan. 1, has prompted protests from state employees because of the increase in the monthly premiums employees must pay. For the first time, state employees will have to pay a monthly charge to participate in the plan based on their incomes.

The new policy also requires state employees who smoke to pay an additional $10 a month surcharge.

K-State gargoyles, graduate desperate Toilet paper, recreation needed

Dear Jeff,

I am upset with the hideous actions of this University! Many times I have telephoned my complaints to the appropriate University officials. I have even tried to settle my grievances through the student judicial system, but the attorney general refuses to hear my case. Your column is my last chance. If I can't get help by publicizing my problem in the Collegian, I will be forced to go to the local authorities.

As of August 1, 1987, I undertook the position of official University Gargoyle. Since that time I have carried out my duties to the best of my abilities. From my office in the tower of Anderson Hall, I sit and look very nasty. This is to keep crows, pigeons and would-be lovers off of the roof. My statistics are quite impressive: irritating crow calls, down 36 percent; pigeon doo-doo, down 41 percent; injuries associated with lovestruck co-eds falling off of the roof, down 57 percent. Thus, I demand respect for a job well done.

I have been in my office in the Anderson tower for almost three months, and during that time the University has refused to restock my supply of toilet paper. According to my contract, I am only allowed to leave my post during a two week vacation in July. The University is supposed to supply my physical needs. Thus, when I got down to two rolls, I submitted the three forms required to request additional toilet paper. I received no response. When I got down to only one roll I submitted the three forms again, along with an emergency rush order form. Nothing. When I got down to one-half of a roll, I resubmitted all the forms I could think of. I also wrote a nasty letter to the superintendent of University toiletries. No reply. No toilet paper. No kidding.

So I leave it to you. Do I sue? Do I sit and stew? Is any job worth what I'm going through? Help me to decide, you are my last hope.

Signed,
Tired of the Tissue Red Tape

Dear Mr. Tissue,

I am very sorry to hear about your dilemma. It obviously strikes you where you live. However, I don't think suing is the answer. Too many people sue each other because they are too lazy to solve their problems by themselves. Don't let yourself fall into that category.

According to a late night creature feature, gargoyles are supposed to be the ugliest things in the world. If you are so scary looking, why don't you try scaring the University into giving you some toilet paper. Threaten to take a picture of yourself and mail it to every high school senior in Kansas with the caption, "This is what K-State has done for me!" Or threaten to model a flimsy negligee at a Town Center Mall fashion show as a representative of a clothing and society class. That should scare the public relations department.

On the other hand, you could go on a late night reconnaissance mission to one of the numerous sorority houses whose trees have just been draped with toilet paper. Retrieving "tee-peed" paper will require more work, but would probably yield more rolls.

Whatever method you try, just remind the University that a person is a person, no matter how ugly he is. Above all, don't forget to stock up on toilet paper during your next vacation. An ignorant gargoyles is not a pretty sight.

Dear Jeff,

I am a female engineering student who will graduate in May. I have achieved high grades and many honors during my last four years, but I feel as if I have studied my whole college career away. As I am debating on which courses to take during my final semester, I am very tempted to punt my studies and live college life to the fullest. Please give me some pointers, I trust you implicitly.

Signed,
Finally Seeing the Light

Dear Finally,

Many a wise graduate hath said, "Don't let school get in the way of your education." Apparently you have decided to follow this school of thought. Welcome to the club!

First, you must trade your Hewlett-Packard calculator for some type of athletic outfit. It is not necessary to actually work out, you just need to give the impression that you do. Furthermore, under no circumstances should you take a class which starts before 10:30 a.m. This may delay your graduation by up to three semesters, but it will certainly improve your nightlife.

Now, what should you do with this extra free time? Studying is out! From now on, only think of studying as a recreation break, not of recreation as a study break. Make it a point to see every music group who performs a concert within the four state region. Try to become on a first-name basis with every waiter, waitress, bartender, ticket taker and police officer in Manhattan. Limit the number of trips you make to Durland Hall to one a day.

Finally, to finance your new recreational habits, sell back all of the engineering textbooks you have been planning to keep as future reference sources. You will probably never need them anyway. When this money runs out, you can always sell your blood plasma for cash, or seek a job as a guinea pig in psychology experiments on the effects of bad breath on the sex drive. Above all, remember the slogan "C = a degree." Just shoot for a 2.0. It will serve to balance out all of the semesters when you shot for a 4.0.

Students should rally behind new association

In college, where you live can determine what you become. Or at least that's what a lot of people seem to think. Why else would they be so thoughtful in their choice of fraternities, sororities, residence halls or off-campus living arrangements?

It is also the case that where you live can determine how much political influence you have. The Greeks seem to be able to field a surprisingly successful group of candidates year after year. Could it be fraternities and sororities are able to do this because they have a relatively small group of members dedicated to furthering the interests of their houses?

In the recent Student Senate election, almost half of those voting listed themselves as being affiliated with a greek organization in a survey which was attached to each of the ballots.

One would think dormitory residents, as the next most tightly packed group of students, would also be the next most cohesive group to be active in supporting a political campaign.

This is, of course, not the case. Those who live in residence halls choose to live in a certain place and not to become a member of an organized peer group as do members of fraternities and sororities. Those living in residence halls are not seeking to meet the expectations of their fellow residents as are the individuals who live in homes with Greek letters above the front porch.

Off-campus residents, who are spread out to the farthest reaches of an acceptable driving distance, are the least organized of student groups.

Student Senate took a tentative step to make them a more cohesive and politically active group last Thursday when they allocated money to advertise the Off-Campus Association.

The Off-Campus Association was created to be a lobbying group for off-campus students. The association will also be able to hire speakers to educate members about issues of concern to them.

It is now up to the off-campus students who become the leaders of this group to make this organization a strong voice for a portion of the student population which has been silent for too long.

Constitutional change benefits pocketbooks

Student Senate acted wisely Thursday by effectively tying the administration's money-grabbing hands.

Senate passed a constitutional amendment which will require a student referendum before the creation of student fees for the construction or renovation of K-State buildings or facilities.

Too bad the funding was approved for Holton Hall before this amendment.

Senate must be praised, though, for recognizing a weak link in the system. In the past, the administration has come to Senate asking for support of state buildings, claiming K-State could not afford to fund the renovation. Senate, of course, has seen it as their duty to "save" the doomed building by utilizing students' money.

Finally, Senate has seen the light and realizes the students cannot afford and should not be forced to pay for state buildings, including Holton, without first having the opportunity to vote on the issue.

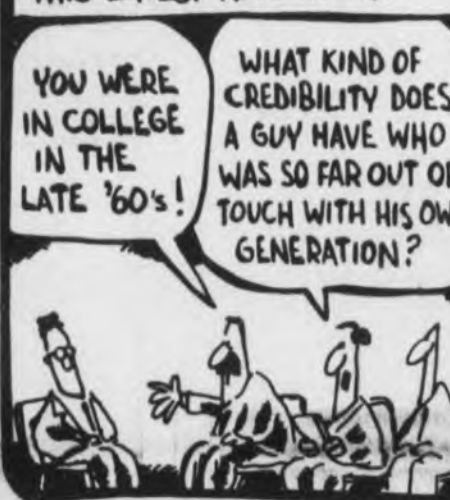

It looks like the administration will have to find another way to get its hands into students' pocketbooks.

Stay off the grass

Editor,

Our thanks to the group or groups that destroyed the grass in Memorial Stadium Saturday by playing children's "Flag Tag" and to the K-State Police for allowing them to do so. I hope you are proud of yourselves. You have unnecessarily added to the work and expense of those trying hard with limited resources to maintain a presentable campus, and have "crapped" on your fellow students that are here for an education and on the Kansas taxpayers.

I'm sure the self-gratification of your behavior is more important than any other consideration. Well done, children. Why not play on the Anderson Quad and Durland lawns the next time it rains? If you don't have the mentality to find these grassy areas, just ask the police for directions.

Mindless trash

Editor,

Dear Dan Owens,
Who died and left you in charge of designing music as quality or "mindless trash"? Why do you feel that music has to have some deeper meaning, some intellectual tone to be personally satisfying? Personally, I listen to my favorite music because it sounds good. It makes me want to sing along or dance. Rarely or never do I listen to music to find out the artist's views on politics or life. I could care less what the lyrics say if I like the music. Among your mindless trash, maybe you would like to include the music of the Doobie Brothers and the lyrics to "Jesus is Just Alright." Jesus, he's my friend/Jesus, he's my friend/He took me by the hand, and led me for the promised land/Jesus, he's my friend. Or perhaps you don't like Foreigner's Lonely children on the run/Lonely children need someone/Lonely children in the night/Lonely children need a guiding light. Now there are some lyrics that you certainly have the duty to improve upon. Or maybe you don't advocate helping underprivileged children or knowing Jesus. Before you release the contents of your biased mind in public, condemning anything you don't happen to like, Mr. Owens, I suggest you take time to consider others' values and interests and duly respect them. Until you learn to do this, keep your condescending views to yourself.

Thanks

Editor,

This is a response to the response which was given by a concerned student at K-State to my recent article titled "Dodging Cars." I do not wish to use her name because I believe that it is in poor taste to use someone's name without their permission. To this person I would like to apologize for some things and thank her for others.

First of all, I would like to say, "I'm sorry that you were involved in an accident. This obviously has affected your life." Secondly, I would like to apologize to you for the fact that you misinterpreted my editorial. Sometimes a direct approach at telling something doesn't get the point across as well. We wanted people to realize what might be causing the accidents, not try to create more accidents.

Now for the thank-you's. I would like to thank you for writing your response because you pointed out the main points of my article. I would also like to thank you for allowing God to not give you any sense of humor, that I might have more.

In conclusion, I would like you to rethink what my article was all about and then I hope you will realize that we didn't want to upset anyone. This also gives me a chance to tell people not to go car dodging, and to tell vehicle drivers to stop to let pedestrians across. Also, one man asked me to add: stop for people in uniform, too. Thank you.

Todd M. Rohr
freshman in electrical engineering

Efforts applauded

Editor,

I applaud the folks from Midland, Texas, for their all-out efforts in rescuing little Jessica McClure. If only that kind of energy could be channeled to the national level to rescue the millions of children living daily in their own deep wells of deprivation and despair.

Mother mourns death

Rabbi hopes other lives will be saved

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Elizabeth Steinberg's natural mother and hundreds of strangers Thursday mourned the death of the 6-year-old who was found beaten in her adoptive parents' apartment, a death a rabbi said he hoped would save the lives of other children.

"We kick ourselves. Why couldn't we see, why couldn't we tell?" Rabbi Dennis Math asked at a funeral after more than 1,000 people paid their respects at Elizabeth's coffin.

"We must risk being wrong, embarrassed, or even evoking a neighbor's anger when we feel a child is being harmed," said Math, who conducted a joint service with a Catholic priest. "May Lisa's death help to save the lives of other children. Then her life will be sanctified."

The child's natural mother, Michelle Launders, saw her newborn daughter for only 20 seconds before giving her up for adoption, but fought in court for the right to bury the child because she did not want it to be done by "the people who killed her."

Police found Elizabeth comatose and brain dead Nov. 2 in lawyer Joel Steinberg's Greenwich Village apartment.

A judge ruled Tuesday that Elizabeth was never legally adopted, and sources familiar with the investigation said Thursday that police were still trying to determine whether the girl was a commodity in a black market baby-selling ring.

Steinberg, a lawyer, and his live-in lover, Hedda Nussbaum, are charged with murder and endangering the welfare of a child in the case.

Cardinal John J. O'Connor was among more than 1,000 visitors to the casket of the girl whose death outraged the city. The coffin was surrounded with small individual bouquets from visitors as well as larger floral arrangements.

Other cards and letters from mourners who had never met the girl were left beneath or atop the casket.

"To Lisa, God bless you," read a hand-made card with flowers drawn in crayon from 9-year-old Padre Smith. "I hope the angels watch over you."

Mourners, many weeping openly, filed past the white steel casket in a steady stream Thursday morning at the Redden Funeral Home. A joint funeral service was held because Michelle Launders is Catholic, Steinberg and Hedda Nussbaum Jewish.

"There's a particular pain in the death of Lisa," said the Rev. Kevin O'Brien at the funeral. "Innocence and suffering should not go together."

The body was taken to a cemetery in Valhalla, north of the city, where Elizabeth was buried at Michelle Lauder's family plot.

"It's not right to have my child buried by the people who killed her," Michelle Launders, 26, testified at the court hearing. At Michelle Launders' request, the death certificate identified the child as "Baby Girl Launders, also known as Lisa."

Steinberg and Hedda Nussbaum both face a second charge of endangering the welfare of a child stemming from their treatment of 16-month-old Mitchell.

Annual ROTC food drive provides meals to needy

By The Collegian Staff

Air Force ROTC collected 889 items of food this year for their annual food drive held from Oct. 26 to Nov. 7.

All food items and proceeds the Air Force ROTC collected will go to the Flint Hills Bread Basket. From there the items will be distributed to the needy.

John Robinson, senior in management and an Air Force ROTC cadet, said the food drive is sort of a competition between the cadet flights. For every item a cadet puts into the food drive box, their flight gets a point.

Points earned through different ways such as the food drive and inspections are tallied throughout the semester, he said. The flight with the most points at the end of the semester is the honor flight. The honor flight gets a $50 bonus which they can spend to their liking.

Besides helping the needy, the food drive is a "big boost" for the cadets to earn more points, Robinson said.

Cadets collected food items themselves and they had set up boxes in the local grocery stores, he said.

Although there were not many food items collected at the grocery stores, a donor contributed a $50 check in one of the boxes, said Brian Borgen, senior in management and an Air Force ROTC cadet.

"The theaters were willing (to help with the food drive) but they had schedule conflicts, and it just didn't work out for us," Borgen said.

Money cutoff planned

More than 311,000 births expected

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The planned cutoff of U.S. money for international planned parenthood programs could result in 1,200 maternal deaths and 69,000 additional abortions worldwide over the next three years, according to a study released Thursday.

The study by University of Michigan researchers also concluded that the cutoff would lead to an additional 311,000 live births over three years.

The $23 million annual funding for Family Planning International Assistance is scheduled to end Jan. 1, the group's U.S. parent organization — Planned Parenthood Federation of America — said Thursday.

The Agency for International Development will not renew the funding because the group has rejected a demand that it not assist foreign family planning programs that include abortion or abortion counseling, even if they use their own funds rather than U.S. money.

This cutoff will have a direct affect on human beings and on misery, said Faye Wattleton, president of Planned Parenthood.

Rather than reducing abortions, it will lead to 69,000 more of them, as well as increases in maternal deaths and unplanned births, she said, citing a study done for her group.

An AID spokesman said later Thursday that "the premise of the study appears to be based on assumptions that (a) family planning funds will be reduced and (b) if Planned Parenthood does not provide the services, no one else will. Both are wrong. Family planning funding has not been reduced and other organizations are ready to pick up any slack that may occur as a result of Planned Parenthood taking itself out of the program."

"This administration strongly supports family planning. It does oppose abortion. Planned Parenthood is trying to turn a fight over abortion into a fight over family planning," said the spokesman, who declined to be identified.

"This is an administration that's out to defend the left and, boy, Planned Parenthood is the pelt they've wanted on their wall for years," commented Sharon Camp, vice president of the private Population Crisis Committee.

Already other administration cuts in population programs, based on abortion policies in other nations, have had an impact on family planning around the world, she said.

Camp charged that this "creeping crud of a policy" is having a negative effect on women's health.

Wichita hosts Def Leppard; concert worth waiting for

By Judd Annis
Collegian Reviewer

After a four-year absence, Wednesday night's Def Leppard concert in Wichita's Kansas Coliseum was well worth the wait.

Since their previous album, the band has gone through several production problems and personal tragedies (drummer Rick Allen lost his arm in a car wreck in '84) making Leppard's success both hard fought and well deserved. Still, Elliot and company try to add a little extra to each performance.

Take their stage, for instance. The band used the center of the arena floor, giving them four stages at once, and making the setup completely open. With this arrangement, there isn't a bad seat in the house and the band can roam freely. Simply put, it's the best stage I've ever seen.

Concert Review

When the curtains fell, they unveiled the band already rockin' with "Stagefright." "Rock, Rock, (Till You Drop)," "Women" and "Another Hit and Run" followed, before the pace slowed with "Too Late For Love" and "Hysteria."

"Gods of War" and "Die Hard the Hunter," songs that address Vietnam and militarism, introduced the band's cutting edge. The thundering sound of an approaching chopper turned eyes skyward and ended "Gods of War," while providing a nice transition to "Die Hard the Hunter."

"Foolin'" and "Animal" peaked the crowd, while "Pour Some Sugar on Me" put the icing on the cake. The set concluded with "Let it Go," and "Rock of Ages."

My hat's off to a bunch of lads from the United Kingdom who're able to weather any storm and still give one of the year's most successful and creative album shows.

It's life, it's love, it's politics; it's...

"The Real Thing"

By Corbin Novotny
Collegian Reporter

The search for the "real thing" in life, love and politics will be the newest adventure for the K-State players. They will perform "The Real Thing" at 8 p.m. November 12-14 and 18-21 in Nichols Theatre.

Tickets for "The Real Thing" can be purchased at the box office in Nichols Theatre between noon and 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. Tickets are $6 for general public and $4 for students and senior citizens.

Written by Tom Stoppard and directed by Lew Shelton, associate professor in speech, "The Real Thing" is a witty play about love and marriage. In this British comedy, two characters, Henry and Annie, played by Mark Cross, junior in theater, and Megan Garner, senior in theater, fall in love. They go through the relationship analyzing their emotions and commitment.

"Henry is an intelligent play-write," said Cross. "He speaks as good as he writes. He likes to seduce people with words."

Henry also likes to stick to commitments, he said. Henry has an affair during his marriage, but he makes a commitment to the girl he's in love with, not his wife. So he divorces his wife and marries her. "Henry is an interesting person," Cross said.

"This is a play that we keep finding more complex," Shelton said. "It is not just a comedy of manners. There's a lot of passion too."

Shelton said the show has a unique type of theatricality. He said he feels that the set doesn't have to be strong and subtle, so he made the set abstract in realistic detail. He said this will allow the witty and passionate ideas to be presented to the audience through the actors and the text, not the set.

With the characters arguing in different places, the technical crew has added a revolving set that will rotate during the show to change locations.

Other cast members include Max, played by Thayne Emrich, junior in theater; Charlotte, played by Jennifer Hays, junior in theater; Billy, played by Donald Olsen, senior in theater; Debbie, played by Carrie Clark, freshman in theater; and Brodie, played by Scott Kelly, graduate in speech.

The K-State players are hosting a TAP workshop, a theater honorary group, for surrounding high schools. There will be approximately 206 students participating.

Workshops in sound, improvisation, movement, dance, audition and acting are some of the clinics the K-State Players are conducting.

After the workshops the K-State Players will perform "The Real Thing" for the students.

"Less Than Zero," almost a zero, but not quite

By Tom McLaughlin
Collegian Reviewer

In the film "Less Than Zero," which opened at theaters last week, packs of overindulging Beverly Hills prigs sport eccentric fashion statements, dance to progressive tunes in grandiose playlands, exploit social drug use and sex, and rock and roll to an unrealistic extreme.

The film begins with the graduation of Clay (Andrew McCarthy), his girlfriend Blair (Jami Gertz) and his best friend Julian (Robert Downey Jr.), at a posh and blindingly colorful Beverly Hills high school.

Movie Review

Julian's graduation gift is enough cash to fulfill his dream of founding a recording studio which epitomizes the youthful idealism of high school. The three friends pose for a final picture which captures the last glimpse of their innocence.

Just as the audience is teased with the foundation of their friendship, we are force-fed the cop-out time shift of "Six Months Later..."

As we trip through the months, we see Clay sleeping in his icy blue room at college. He is eerily awakened by a phone call from Blair who tells him she needs to see him.

Clay falls into flashback mode and remembers a few key events from the last six months. These black-and-white flashbacks are the exposition which tells the audience that Clay and Blair have had a falling out, and have further grown apart because Julian has slept with Blair.

When returning to the brats in Beverly Hills, Clay meets up with his supposed friends and the reunion is complete. The reunion only lets us realize how far the friends have seemingly grown apart. Julian is addicted to cocaine, Blair is a fashion model and Clay a hard working archetype.

Adapted from the Bret Easton Ellis' novel, the film derails from the original story line leaving the audience with a casualty in critical condition. Forgetting the fact that Clay is twisted into a character as Puritanical as Jerry Falwell, we see a triad of teens, who in the novel all have drug message of the film and its extremity. His direction was obviously inspired by the images in the novel; yet the product was very much his own.

Music in the film featured a variety of bands and artists including The Bangles, The Cult, Roy Orbison and Jimmy Hendrix. Although I enjoyed most of the music, I had an enormous problem with music that didn't match the tone or feeling of scenes. At times, instead of underscoring the scene, the music took control and detracted from the dramatic action. I felt as though I was watching a schizophrenic music video.

Certain love scenes were as tender and sensitive as two earth worms mating. Instead of emphasizing the love that the characters were supposed to feel for each other, the lust was exploited.

The major problem with the film was a script that never allowed the characters to become friends before the trauma of dependency set in. Without this very important developing action, there was no contrast for the audience. It is like doing "The Days of Wine and Roses" with no roses. We are expected to assume that the three are friends. Another major gap in the script is the entrapment of Julian which happens without an effective build. The script, although at times episodic, was full of choppy holes which didn't logically connect the line of action.

In general, the film should have never been made for such a huge audience. By changing major portions of the story line, the overall message of the film was harmed. It is, though, a very visually appealing film with some good music and a few fine moments. In essence, "Less Than Zero" isn't quite less than zero. But it's close.

problems, become as sincere and friendly with each other as Robert Bork is with left-wing liberals.

The bonding between the characters, although choppy in the novel, is almost totally ignored in the film. The screenplay does lots of telling and very little showing.

One extreme example is the bisexual theme which is developed in Ellis' dark and pleasure-seeking novel. Instead of dealing with this essential theme, the characters become two-dimensional hedonists with curbed appetites. I know America isn't as liberal as it used to be, but why make a Captain Kangaroo version of the film?

The appeal of Andrew McCarthy's dimples and innocence are about as effective as a pitch-black museum is to viewers. Maybe for his next film he could find a new facial expression that isn't quite so goofy. He was as believable in the role of Clay as Don Rickles would be playing Romeo, and his most believable acting occurred when he got in and out of his car. Frankly, his underplay became flat because he wasn't acting with other characters but acting alone. The delivery of his last speech was about as flat as Utah.

Jami Gertz did a reasonably adequate job in her portrayal of Blair. When she wasn't too busy thinking about standing up straight, she became slightly believable. The problem I have is the added importance her character took on in the film. In the novel, her character is much more minor and catalytic.

James Spader, who played a yuppie mafioso named Rip, and Robert Downey Jr. salvaged the film for me.

Spader illustrated the complexity of his character through his honest and believable acting style. Downey, who played the cocaine addict, was incredibly versatile in his range of believability. He portrayed the ups and downs of drug use and the stages of dependency well. It's obvious that both actors did their homework before walking onto the set.

Stephen Rice's art direction highlighted the film. His use of primary color and blatant color essays, or lack thereof in some cases, punctuated the

REO to perform in Salina

By Chuck Horner
Collegian Reporter

Even if REO Speedwagon decided to stop writing and playing music today, they would have already left an indelible mark on American rock 'n' roll.

REO Speedwagon brings its "Life as We Know It" 1987 world tour Saturday to the Salina Bicentennial Center. The gates will open at 6:30 p.m. and the concert is scheduled to start at 7:30 p.m.

Admission costs $14.50. Seating is on a reserved basis, and seats are still available, said Linda Lagroon of the Bicentennial Center box office.

The concert tour focuses on the band's latest album, "Life as We Know It," which incorporates exotic percussion instruments such as a Brazilian rain stick and a stamp tube. The band has also promised to provide a mix of their classic rock 'n' roll tunes.

REO Speedwagon is a rock 'n' roll band formed in 1970 by Neal Doughty and Alan Gratzer while they were attending the University of Illinois.

The band — Kevin Cronin (lead vocals, rhythm guitar), Gary Richrath (lead guitar), Doughty (keyboards), Bruce Hall (bass guitar) and Gratzer (drums) — focus their music on life, relationships and all the side effects of the two.

The band's first gigs were at fraternity parties, earning $40 and all the mashed potatoes you could lick off the drums, if you got caught in the middle of a food fight, according to press releases by Doughty.

The band did not achieve national recognition until 1977, but refused to entrust the production of their music to a "hot shot producer," despite contrary advice.

The decision was apparently a good one, as every album they have produced since then has turned gold (with sales in excess of 500,000) or platinum (with sales in excess of 1 million).

The band has had worldwide record sales of almost 30 million, including four gold albums and five platinum albums with titles like "You Can Tune a Piano But You Can't Tuna Fish" and their best seller, "Hi Infidelity."

The stage design for the concert features banks of moving, computerized lights, space pyramids and a multi-level stage. It is touted by press releases to be the most visually distinctive stage presentation for REO Speedwagon to date. Five semi-trucks are required to transport the stage equipment.

Questionnaire aids roommate selection

Traits help identify compatibility

By Debbie Lyons
Collegian Reporter

Sex, smoking, age, academic class and major are all taken into consideration when the Department of Housing assigns roommates.

"Considering the current divorce rate, we actually do better (at matching up roommates) than married couples," said Thomas Frith, director of the Department of Housing.

Frith said out of 3,900 residents, a small number choose to move after the first semester for many reasons — not necessarily roommate incompatibility.

Students moving into residence halls may pre-select a roommate by writing in the name of the person they want to live with on the housing application. If the choice is mutual, they will be matched automatically, Frith said.

If the student hasn't specified a roommate choice on the housing application, a roommate will be assigned based on responses to questions on the application.

The questions identify people based on personal traits such as early risers, smokers, drinkers, age, sex, major and academic class level.

"This is no guarantee that...they will be compatible," Frith said.

However, the questions are an attempt to identify basic similarities, he said.

Other questions about race or religion might be helpful, but those questions are not on the application, Frith said. It might also be helpful to identify the resident's financial status, he said.

K-State students are unusually good people and they really want to get along with their roommates, Frith said.

"That's the key to our success (in matching up roommates)," he said. Residents can get help with their roommate difficulties. Each floor has staff people available to the residents to help them work out problems. When the problem cannot be worked out, the residents can talk to the hall director, who is in charge of room assignments within the hall.

"Our biggest limit is space," Frith said. This year, the residence halls are 98 percent filled.

Theoretically a student can move anytime, but when the halls are full it's difficult to find a vacancy for the resident, he said.

Basketball season 'unofficially' begins

By Bill Lang
Sports Writer

K-State's men's basketball team will receive its first test of the season Saturday night when the Spirit Express rolls into town.

The Spirit Express is an amateur team consisting of former college players who now play for the Christian-athlete team based in Memphis, Tenn.

"I don't know that much about them," Kruger said. "I haven't even seen their roster. We do know that they have a 3-1 record and shoot the ball pretty freely from the perimeter."

One thing Kruger does know is his team is approaching the 7:30 tip-off with the attitude that it will count on the regular season standings.

"It'll be a regular game," he said. "It'll be good for the team to play someone different than themselves. They'll get a chance to see how they have developed as a team."

"We've got (Ron) Meyer, (Charles) Bledsoe, (Mark) Dobbins, Mitch (Richmond) and Steve (Henson) starting for us," he added. "They've been playing well together as a team and are looking forward to the contest."

Kruger also mentioned last Monday at Wildcat Media Day that the 'Cats are at about the same place they were last year during preseason conditioning.

"We are just about where we were, compared with last season, in terms of running the ball, defensive game and offensive game plans," he said. "We had a head start in people knowing the game plans and the drills done in practice. We know we have to be better than last year and that we have to work harder," he said. "There are some things we have to work on but that will come with time."

The Express comes into Ahearn with a 3-1 record, with wins over Mississippi County Community College, Carson Newman College and Liberty University. The Express' only loss was to Virginia Tech, an NCAA Tournament qualifier last season, 81-67.

The Express boasts a record of 46-20 since the arrival of its new coach Eldon Lawyer two seasons ago.

Lawyer said his team is at its best "when we run and gun and don't try and play the physical type of game."

"We've got to utilize the whole floor," he added. "Let the guys who can shoot the lights out go for it. We're going to emphasize defense and keeping a fast tempo when we've got the ball."

A few of the players to watch for on the Express team are Fred Gilliam, Quinton Lytle and Carl Gonder.

Gilliam, a 6-foot-8 center from Clemson University, scored more than 1,000 points during his college career and finished in the top 15 in rebounding for the Tigers. Gilliam, in his second season with the Express, is expected to start at center.

The floor leader of the Express is 6-foot-2 guard Lytle, in his first season with the Express team after starting for Western Carolina University. Lytle, who owns a vertical jump of 42 inches, averaged 20.8 and 17.5 points during his junior and senior campaigns.

Kruger said whatever the Express throws at the 'Cats, they should be able to handle it with a good effort.

"As I mentioned, they have some good shooters," he said. "We'll be paying attention to the player who gets the hot hand and attempt to shut him down. It'll be a good opportunity for our team to see what they can do against someone different. They should do all right."

'Cats hope to claim 'If Bowl' title

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

One could call Saturday's K-State-Iowa State gridiron matchup the "If Bowl."

Both Wildcats' coach Stan Parrish and Cyclones' mentor Jim Walden have made public appeals to the NCAA saying, "if" they could strengthen their ranks through added scholarships, their respective programs would be improved.

"(Iowa State's and K-State's) numbers are the lowest in the conference," Parrish said. "There's no question added scholarships would help us. The lack of numbers affects you in practice, competition for positions, morale...it affects every stage of your program."

National Collegiate Athletic Association rules stipulate that only 25 initial scholarships may be awarded each season. Iowa State started the season with 61 scholarship players; K-State, 73. The NCAA allows scholarships for 95 players.

Beginning the season with badly outmanned squads, the two teams enter the game with losing records and only one Big Eight Conference win between them.

Walden, in his first year at ISU, coached for nine seasons at Washington State before coming to Ames. He said there is no comparison between the Pac-10 and "Big Two and little six" conferences.

"Aside from the two national powers (Oklahoma and Nebraska)...there's not anybody in our league who could place in the top three of the Pac 10 right now," Walden said.

"Part of it is the problem I've been telling everybody about. Until we get some sort of recovery system to allow us to participate in (the Big Eight), the league is never going to change," he added.

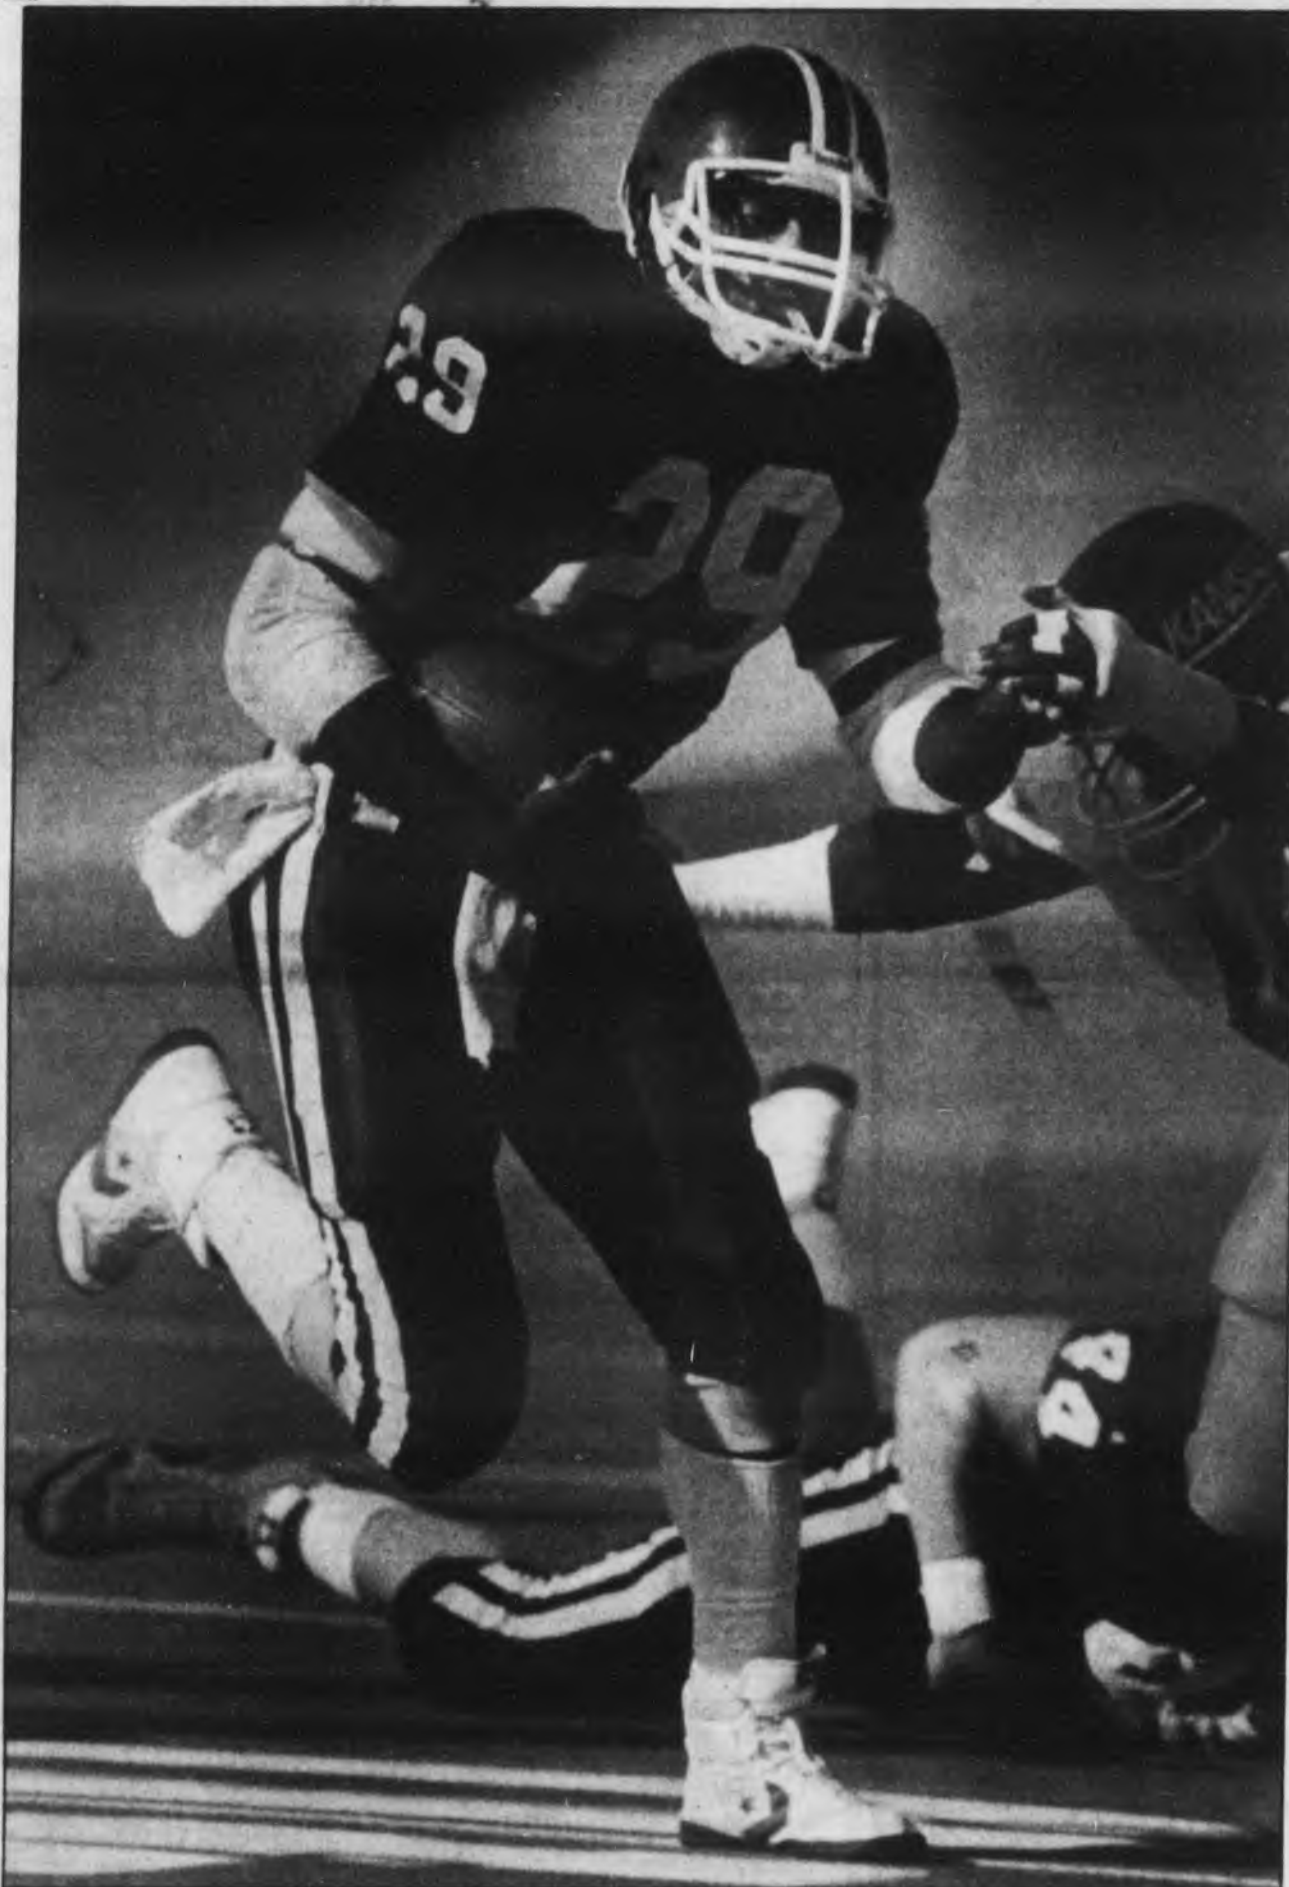

But Iowa State, 2-7 overall and 1-4 in the Big Eight, has met Walden's preseason expectations. The Cyclones' wins included a 42-28 thrashing of the University of Kansas at Lawrence, and a one-point victory against division I-AA power the University of Northern Iowa.

"I knew when we started the season with 61 guys if we could win one game, it would be a happy goal for me," Walden said.

Entering its last home game of the season, Iowa State is led offensively by running back Joe Henderson. The 6-foot, 202-pound junior has rushed 905 yards out of ISU's veer offense this year and is making a serious bid to become the first Cyclone since Dwayne Crutchfield in 1981 to rush for more than 1,000 yards.

Though Walden said he will keep the offense simple against K-State, 0-8-1 and 0-4-1, Parrish isn't buying it.

"God knows (what to expect from

K-State running back Tony Jordan hopes to repeat history Saturday in Ames against Iowa State University. Last year Jordan set a K-State single-game rushing record in Ames with 218 yards.

ISU offensively)," Parrish said. "Walden's kept it fun for them. He's like (Notre Dame Coach Lou) Holtz. He grabs into that magic bag and pulls something out."

Defensively against the Wildcats, Walden said the key is stopping Tony Jordan. In last year's match against ISU, Jordan set a school rushing record with 218 yards on 35 carries. Jordan scored three touchdowns in the game, including one on a 74-yard pass reception from Tim Hanson and another on an 89-yard run.

"If we can get that from (Jordan) and another 300 from the rest of the team, we'll have a pretty good day," Parrish said.

But the K-State coach hinted the 'Cats might not rely solely on its ground game at Iowa State.

"We've worked really hard throwing the ball this week. I think you'll see us throw the ball a little more than we have," Parrish said.

Those people are wide receiver John Williams, who averages 19.8 yards per reception with four touchdowns, and Kent Dean. The senior tight end now has 396 yards, third highest in K-State history for a tight end. His 32 catches account for more than one-fourth of the Wildcats' completions.

Kickoff is 1 p.m. Saturday from Cyclone Stadium in Ames.

Harriers hoping for qualification

By Chase Clark
Sports Writer

Going into the NCAA Region 5 cross country meet this weekend in Columbia, Mo., K-State Coach John Capriotti has reservations about his women's team and its future.

"It will be a cut-throat meet," Capriotti said. "This is where they pick the teams that go to the NCAA Championships. They've made the NCAA Championships so hard to get to now that these meets are really competitive."

"They're only taking two men's and two women's teams. We've got three real good women's teams in (the Big Eight Conference) and only two can go. So one good team is going to be left home. We were third in our conference, so if we don't run better, it's going to be us (that stays home). We're just going to hope for the best," Capriotti said.

K-State's women's team at the meet will consist of freshmen Jenny Faunce and Renee Russell, sophomores Marge Eddy, Becky Ives and Tammy Van Laeys, junior Laura Haggerty and seniors Alysun Deckert and Anne Stadler.

Capriotti was slightly disappointed in the women's effort in the Big Eight Conference meet and feels his top runners must do better if the team is going to advance further in the NCAA Championships.

"It's going to be close," Capriotti said. "We are going to need some better races out of our up-front runners like Haggerty, Stadler, Faunce and Deckert. They are going to have to run a lot better than they did (at the Big Eight meet)."

At the Big Eight meet two weeks ago, the K-State women's team placed third overall behind the University of Colorado and the University of Nebraska. Haggerty placed eighth overall with a 17:55 time in the 5,000-meter race. Deckert placed eleventh, Faunce placed sixteenth and Stadler came in seventeenth. Capriotti feels they could have done better, though.

"Haggerty was running well at conference until the last couple of hundred yards when she had a heat problem and had a hard time finishing," he said. "I think she'll be all right. Anne has been having a real good cross country season, but she just had a down day at conference."

"Alysun is coming out and really looking good in practice right now. Faunce has run better (this season) than she did at conference meet. So those girls have had good races. We should be in good shape but we need to run well to qualify (for nationals). It should be a pretty exciting meet," Capriotti said.

Capriotti said the top female runner in the meet should be Oklahoma State runner Jackie Goodman. At the conference meet, Goodman took the top place with a 16:57.84 time.

'Cat volleyball team ends regular season

By Chase Clark
Sports Writer

After going ten days without playing a match, the K-State volleyball team is ready to return to competition.

The Wildcats face the University of Missouri at 7:30 tonight in Ahearn Field House and wrap up the regular season 1:30 p.m. Sunday in Ahearn against the University of Oklahoma.

"We're looking forward to competing," K-State Coach Scott Nelson said. "We've had pretty intense, upbeat practices (this week). It may take us a few points to get into our game rhythm because we haven't played for several days."

Even though the outcome of the matches probably won't change K-State's standing in the Big Eight Conference, Nelson said the matches are important in several ways.

"The matches are significant because they're momentum heading into the Big Eight championships next weekend," Nelson said. "We want to be playing good volleyball. We want to be improving and be competitive. Playing a good team like Oklahoma is going to be a great preparation for us."

Missouri is not a team Nelson is taking lightly, even though the Tigers are 8-20 overall and 0-10 in conference play. Missouri holds an 18-8 lead in head-to-head play with K-State, but K-State won the last meeting in four games in Columbia, Mo.

Oklahoma, 20-7 overall and 8-2 in Big Eight play, defeated K-State in three games earlier this season in Norman, Okla.

Soccer team travels to KC to host ninth annual event

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Soccer Club will travel to Kansas City, Kan., this weekend to host the Ninth Annual Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament.

First round play begins for the 'Cats Saturday morning at 9:30 against the University of Nebraska at Omaha. Also Saturday, K-State takes on the University of Northern Iowa and the University of Kansas.

The tournament is named after Edward E. Chartrand, once a player on the K-State Soccer team, who died in 1979 at the age of 22.

The festivities will feature a presentation of a $500 soccer scholarship to a former Shawnee Mission Northwest High School soccer player. The recipient of the first scholarship will be Troy Illum, who is now playing for K-State.

Last year, the University of Missouri at Kansas City took the Chartrand title. K-State has advanced to the semi-finals in each tournament since 1983, and in 1985 the 'Cats won the championship.

Other squads participating in the tournament are Iowa State University, The Wichita State University, Oklahoma State University and the University of Nebraska.

Rugby team faces 'must win' game

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

It all boils down to one match for K-State's collegiate A-side rugby squad as it faces the University of Kansas in a 1:30 p.m. contest Saturday at Gorman Park in Manhattan.

The contest, which is the last scheduled action of the year for both squads, will decide the Heart of America Union Championship and which team advances to the Western Collegiate Territorial Championships to be held in April.

"(The championship game) ought to be an emotional, intense game. It is every year," said K-State team president Dave Todd. "We're expecting a fast-paced, hard-hitting game."

"(Kansas doesn't) have the personnel we have, but they always play us tough due to the fact that it's for the championship and the fact that it is the KU-K-State game," he added.

K-State's club side will open the play for the day by taking on KU's club side at noon, and the collegiate B-side will play the final match of the day against KU's B-side beginning at 3 p.m.

K-State's B-side has faced KU's collegiate A-side squad twice this season, posting an even 1-1 record against the Jayhawks. The 'Cats were soundly defeated in the first contest early in the season at Swope Park in Kansas City, but they took a 3-0 decision from the 'Hawks on Oct. 17 in the Heart of America Invitational Tournament, also at Swope Park.

The Heart of America Championship has come down to the K-State-KU game the last seven years and the 'Cats have come out on top in each of those matchups and advanced to regional play.

"We have a lot of guys that have played A-side for us this year and because of that, we'll have more guys with A-side collegiate experience than they have," Todd said. "It's hard to say how the game will come out because they are always up when it comes to playing us."

"The way I see it, the team that makes the least amount of mistakes will probably win it," he added. "That's usually how games like these are decided. When you're playing such a physical game at such a fast pace, you always have the possibility of it getting a little sloppy."

K-State has only one injured player who won't participate in this weekend's action. Todd sustained a serious ankle injury in a match two weeks ago and will be sidelined.

ka today to turn it in to the regional office. Of the $5,000, he said he would receive $4,000 after taxes. After he receives his prize money, Rider said he is going to purchase a sailboat to use at Lake Milford. He said he has been wanting one for a long time and previously thought about selling his car just to get one. Of the other 15 tickets, Rider said he won several "$2 prizes and three or four free-ticket prizes." Stewart bought his winning ticket at Town & Country Market in Junction City. He works for Junction City Parks and Forestry Department, but was unable to be reached for comment. While there were a few big winners, others lost money, broke even or made a little.

"I'm pretty much breaking even. Right now, I'm ahead a little," said Michael Lusen, Manhattan. Lusen was stopping at various stores purchasing tickets. At his stop at Dillons, he won three free tickets. Bob McKinnon, Wamego, said he and Lusen were partners in the venture. "We've made a pact. Whatever we win, we split," McKinnon said. However, Lusen was quick to add that before they divide any "big" winnings, one-half will be donated to a local charity. "It's good for the state and its economy. I won't continue to do it all the time or I'll get addicted to it," he said. To help the Kansas economy is one of the reasons Dillons decided to sell the tickets, said George Kandt, store manager. "It sure has picked up foot traffic. It's been busy," Kandt said. "We're selling them in the cage and at the registers." Dillons donated 300 tickets to be given away during the kick-off celebration Thursday afternoon at the Manhattan Town Center. The store is also expecting to sell about 3,500 tickets each week, Kandt said. First day sales made a difference in store traffic, said Sue Grant, manager of Town & Country Market. "We've been busy all morning. But, I think it will slack off," she said. Grant said that in the first six hours, she sold about 500 tickets. The majority of winners, she said, were trading the tickets for more tickets. "We're getting a lot of $1 bills," Grant said. Tim Daily, Salina, couldn't decide if he wanted money or tickets when he won $10. He decided to get five tickets and $5.

Kennedy

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 receptive to the new tone and ready to accept the characterization of Kennedy — barring negative revelations at the confirmation hearings. The Los Angeles Times reported Thursday that while Kennedy was lobbying between May 1967 and April 1975 for Schenley Industries Inc., in Sacramento, Calif., the giant liquor producer allegedly was paying hundreds of thousands of dollars in illegal kickbacks to liquor distributors and restaurants in New York and California. The newspaper said state records give no indication that Kennedy played any role in the illicit schemes. Kennedy is considered to be a moderate conservative, less ideologically rigid than Reagan's two earlier nominees. He has 12 years of experience on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and has written more than 400 opinions.

state of building up the talent of the younger runners and has six people red-shirted. With that in mind, Capriotti isn't expecting his men's team to place any higher than fifth or sixth.

"Our men won't qualify because we're having that redshirt program where we've sat out six young kids," Capriotti said. "We're just going there for the experience."

K-State's men's team at the meet will consist of freshmen Joe Bonneau and Phil Byrne, sophomores David Keller and Tom Mitchell and juniors Daryl Reichard, Jeff Shelar and Brian Zwahlen.

"Two of the men have a chance of placing high in the individual standings and possibly going on to nationals," Capriotti said.

"I think Phil Byrne and David Keller have an outside chance at being one of the top individuals," Capriotti said. "They did a great job at the conference meet. If you are one of the top three individuals who aren't on a qualifying team you get to go to nationals...as long as the team is in the top 15 overall. (Byrne and Keller) are in that top 10 group of individuals that have a shot."

Top student of semester chosen

By The Collegian Staff

Amy Hemphill, senior in music education, will receive $100 for being chosen the College of Arts and Sciences' student of the semester. The selection committee looked for "the student that best exemplifies the student in arts and sciences. We look at all (the applicants') campus and community activities, along with (the applicants') transcripts," said Shannon Fuller, senior in psychology and chairperson of the committee. Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, will present Hemphill with a check for $100 and a plaque at the Arts and Sciences Council's meeting in two weeks, Fuller said. "It's a big honor because very accomplished and deserving people applied (for the title), so I'm excited," Hemphill said. She said she thinks her broad education in the College of Arts and Sciences and her grade point average of 4.0 contributed to her receiving the title. She sings in the K-State Choir, the Madrigals and also participated in the musical "South Pacific" this fall. The head of each department in the college has the opportunity to nominate a student. Students can nominate themselves or be nominated by a friend.

Music major awarded

Hemphill said one of her professors encouraged her to apply for the title after reading an advertisement for the contest in the Collegian. Anyone in the College of Arts and Sciences can apply for the title, Fuller said. Each semester a new student is chosen. This semester three applications were submitted. The selection committee was composed of three faculty members and three students. It reviewed the applications submitted, read a 500-word essay about liberal arts.

Project to fight hunger presented to students

By The Collegian Staff

The beginning of what could someday become K-State's largest and most comprehensive student project to fight world hunger was the topic presented by Bill Hoogterp, assistant campaign director for the National Student Campaign Against Hunger. Hoogterp, who spoke to a small group of interested students and community representatives Thursday night in the Union, offered information and encouraged K-State to become involved in a project called "The Hunger Cleanup." In the project, students spend three hours on a designated day doing work projects for the community.

Airplane crash kills 26 people in Denver

By The Associated Press

DENVER — A Continental Airlines jet with 82 people aboard flipped on its back while taking off from Denver's airport in a snowstorm Sunday and skidded along the runway, killing at least 26 people and injuring 56 more, authorities said.

Rescue work was hampered by ice and falling snow, visibility was poor and some survivors were trapped inside the wreckage for more than five hours before they could be rescued, authorities at Stapleton International Airport said.

Twenty-one people who suffered only minor injuries walked away from the crash, officials said.

The DC-9 Series 10 twin-engine jet, Flight 1713, was carrying 77 passengers and five crew members from Denver to Boise, Idaho, according to Norm Avery, a public affairs officer at the airport.

Continental spokesman Ned Walker said the flight originated in Oklahoma City, and the crash took place shortly after 2 p.m. MST.

"It's too early to speculate on anything that could have occurred (to make the plane crash)," Walker said.

National Transportation Safety Board chairman James Burnett and nine Washington-based investigators will fly to Denver to investigate the crash, NTSB spokesman Ted Lopatkiewicz said.

Avery said 26 people had died in the crash, and the other 56 aboard were injured. Dr. Peter Pons at Denver General Hospital said three survivors were in critical condition.

Rescue workers set up emergency lights on the runway and used electric saws to remove wreckage in a frantic effort to rescue survivors. The last bodies were not pulled from the wreckage until about seven hours after the crash.

The airport was closed shortly after the accident, but another runway was opened and airport traffic resumed by 8 p.m.

Paul Spurgeon, division chief with the Denver Fire Department, said the plane flipped upside down on a north-south runway at Stapleton International Airport and skidded for more than one-quarter mile before coming to a halt.

Aircraft tower authorities reported seeing a fireball when the accident occurred, but other officials said any fire in the plane was minimal.

"We have a number of injuries caused by impact, not from fire," said Spurgeon.

Wyckoff said the plane was in pieces, "resting on its top," and that there were "A lot of injuries, and there are fatalities lying around."

He said the plane went sliding off the runway, and its position was making it difficult to get survivors out. Firefighters were using "everything that they have at their disposal to open that aircraft up right now."

Rescue work was hampered by blowing snow and freezing conditions. Some injured patients were taken to a fire station at the airport for preliminary treatment before being transported to hospitals, said Spurgeon.

Police officer Robert Bales confirmed that a temporary morgue had been set up at a firehouse at the airport.

"It reportedly happened at 4:16 p.m. EST," said Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Fred Farrar in Washington.

Snow was falling steadily in Denver most of the day, and airport authorities said earlier that visibility was low and flights were hampered by strong crosswinds. At least one-half foot of new snow had fallen by midday.

Spurgeon said the runway was not visible from the fire command post.

K-State's aid default rate 3.8 percent above average

By Julie Key
Collegian Reporter

K-Staters are defaulting on their student loans at a rate higher than the national average, according to a national survey.

The U.S. Department of Education, which recently released default rates for federal student aid programs, listed K-State as having a default rate of 16.8 percent, 3.8 percent higher than the national average.

Although Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, said the default rate is too high, he doesn't think it's any more of a problem than at any other institution.

A report by the National Association of Financial Aid Administrators said the formula used by the DOE differs substantially from formulas used to establish annualized default rates with other consumer credit programs.

The DOE formula measures the number of borrowers who have gone into default during the first two years of their repayment obligation. Other consumer credit measurements used by loan agencies assess the agencies' losses in loan defaults in one year compared to the amount of loan repayment in that year.

K-State's default rate according to the Higher Education Assistance Foundation is 11.8 percent, which is based on more than 10 years of loans, Viterna said.

"I believe the secretary of education (William J. Bennett) is trying to pick the worst year to compare default rates to start to discredit the GSL (guaranteed student loan) program," he said.

Viterna said Bennett has threatened to cut schools off from participating in federal student aid programs in the future if their default rates exceed 20 percent.

A loan is defaulted when the borrower is 180 days delinquent on the first payment, said Sharon O'Neal, student loan coordinator at Columbia Savings. At that point, the lender or holder of the loan turns it in to a guarantee agency which pays it off.

The agency is required to make collection efforts before turning the defaulted loan in to the Department of Education.

"It's too convenient to put students in default status without doing everything possible to get the student to pay," Viterna said.

The requirements for defaulting a loan should be made more extensive, Viterna said. Those groups collecting loans should be required to contact each reference listed on the loan application.

Also, secondary and collection agencies should be required to contact the lending institution or university to find a current address of the student, he said.

"Students (who are paying on their loan) should have more latitude in getting out of default status," Viterna said. A student remains in default status until the entire loan is paid off.

It should be shown on their credit rating report if students, after being contacted, refuse to pay their loans, he said.

Among the seven Board of Regents institutions, K-State has the third lowest default rate behind the University of Kansas and Fort Hays State University.

In the Big Eight conference, K-State ranks behind the University of Missouri, University of Nebraska, Oklahoma State University and KU. Figures from University of Oklahoma, University of Colorado and Iowa State University are not available.

Deficit talks near deadline

Failure not tolerable, negotiators say

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Deficit reduction talks between the White House and Congress are into their deadline week with participants confident of success — because they can't permit a failure.

"The whole country views it as a test of whether the president and Congress can really govern," Rep. Leon Panetta, D-Calif., one of the negotiators, said this weekend.

The talks nearly collapsed on Thursday, scaring not only the people in the room but those outside.

News Analysis

"Not only didn't we like the taste of it, but clearly the signal from our fellow members (was) they wanted something significant done," Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., a negotiator and senior Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, said this weekend.

On Friday, the talks restarted. Taped on the wall was a full-page newspaper ad from business and civic leaders calling for "Decisive Action: A Bipartisan Budget Plan."

After less than two hours, the House, Senate and White House staffs were sent scurrying for a weekend of numbers-crunching. The bargainers will need the details this week to flesh out a plan to reduce the deficit by $75 billion or more over the next two years.

The goal of the talks, begun three weeks ago after the Wall Street collapse, is to reduce the fiscal 1988 deficit by at least $23 billion to an estimated $144 billion, as required by the Gramm-Rudman law. That would avert automatic spending cuts under the budget-balancing law, which without agreement would take effect Friday.

The bargainers go into the week with the outline of an agreement that for fiscal 1988 would:

■ Raise taxes about $10 billion, plus add some new fees for government services and step up enforcement of income tax laws.

■ Allow the Pentagon about $285.5 billion to spend this year, more than last year but far less than the $297 billion Reagan requested.

■ Restrain inflation growth in domestic agency budgets, to save about $2.8 billion, and cut costs in Medicare and farm subsidies by up to $5 billion combined.

Those items, along with concurrent savings in debt payments that result, would satisfy Gramm-Rudman. Another $6.3 billion could be saved through some accounting maneuvers, including refinancing of rural electric loans and changes in selling terms of a government loan portfolio. That would bring the total fiscal 1988 savings to about $32 billion.

Stretched into fiscal 1989, the program would cut that deficit by $44 billion to $50 billion, including $19 billion in higher taxes.

Sen. Rudy Boschwitz, R-Minn., chairman of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee said he believes "it's politically the wrong thing" to just meet the minimum requirements of Gramm-Rudman.

"I think the politically right thing to do is to do something bold," Boschwitz said.

He said he is organizing a bipartisan group of senators to go to the White House tomorrow and urge Reagan to put Social Security back on the table and to go along with more taxes if more can also be squeezed from the spending side of the ledger.

"That would be bold. Then, do it for a few years," he said. "I think that good policy is also good politics," he said, adding that a dozen of the 15 GOP Senate candidates he was helping would agree.

Boschwitz said that if the talks broke down and the economy faltered, Reagan would probably take most of the blame.

Kennedy's nomination splits pro-life community

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Anthony M. Kennedy's Supreme Court nomination has split the anti-abortion community, even though he has never ruled on an abortion case during 12 years on the bench.

One anti-abortion organization offered positive, but guarded praise for the nomination, a second strongly criticized it, and two other groups took no position.

The abortion question is crucial to these groups and to pro-choice organizations because the court is considered split 4-4 on the issue. The next nominee could tip the balance for years to come.

Pro-choice groups and other women's organizations have taken no position yet on Kennedy.

The Sacramento, Calif., jurist, who is on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, has not spoken out on any issue since his nomination was announced Wednesday by President Reagan. None of the organizations researching his abortion record has found any previous comment on the subject.

The anti-abortion National Right To Life Committee reacted positively toward Kennedy because he favors judicial restraint — interpreting the law, not making it. The organization said only a judicial activist would favor a decision such as Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion.

But another anti-abortion group, the American Life League, said it mistrusts anyone the Reagan White House would nominate for the court, and opposes Kennedy because he didn't criticize the Roe decision the one chance he had to do so.

The league referred to the only instance in more than 400 written opinions that Kennedy mentioned the abortion ruling.

That was in 1980, when Kennedy wrote for a three-judge panel in the case of Beller vs. Middendorf. The ruling upheld former Navy regulations calling for the automatic discharge of sailors who engaged in homosexual conduct. Kennedy cited Roe in that ruling without making any comment, favorable or unfavorable.

Paul Brown, chief executive officer of the league, said the decision proves that Kennedy is "bad on his own record in dealing with Roe vs. Wade." He said, "Just by citing the decision, he legitimizes the decision."

Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right To Life Committee, disagreed. He commented, "In our view, the Middendorf ruling reveals little one way or the other about Judge Kennedy's views on the Supreme Court precedence regarding abortion."

Curt Young, executive director of the evangelical Christian Action Council, said, "We're watching and waiting. We haven't endorsed and we're not opposing. We're going to be inclined to trust the president because he is representative of our concerns as well."

Another anti-abortion group, March For Life, said it also had no position yet on the nomination.

1 dies in Oklahoma bus crash

WYANDOTTE, Okla. — One person died and 16 others were injured Sunday night when a bus crashed on a rain-slicked highway in Ottawa County, authorities said.

The Oklahoma Highway Patrol confirmed that a bus was involved in the accident at the intersection of Oklahoma Highway 10 and U.S. Highway 60 near Wyandotte.

Pat Baumert, spokesman for Baptist Hospital in Miami, said one person was dead on arrival at the hospital and another was transferred to St. John's Hospital in Joplin, Mo.

The nursing supervisor at St. John's said the person admitted was in surgery for a broken arm.

Baptist spokeswoman Karen Pyne said two other passengers were admitted to the Miami hospital in satisfactory condition, one was being held for observation and 13 others were treated and released from the Miami hospital Sunday night.

"There are no critical injuries," she said.

Snowstorm batters West

The West's first major snowstorm of the season swept across Colorado on Sunday, dumping up to 18 inches of snow, creating near-blizzard conditions, slowing airport operations and closing some roads.

The National Weather Service posted winter storm warnings Sunday for the mountains of west-central and north-central New Mexico, the eastern foothills of Colorado, including the Denver metropolitan area, and the mountains of southern Wyoming. Snow also began falling in the Nebraska Panhandle.

The same storm system generated intense thunderstorms over parts of the southern Plains that spun off three tornadoes in Texas, the weather service said. Two people were killed by a tornado that ripped across the town of Caldwell.

Snow and strong north wind created near-blizzard conditions across Colorado's northeastern plains, the weather service said. Wind gusts up to 68 mph were recorded at Pueblo.

Wind blowing at up to 45 mph and limited visibility in blowing snow also caused delays and cancellations of flights at Denver's Stapleton International Airport, where 5 inches had fallen by midmorning, said Richard Boulware, public information officer.

"The flight cancellations are in the dozens," he said, adding that delays ranged from 30 to 90 minutes.

Roads in many areas of Colorado were snowpacked and icy, and chains were required on many mountain passes, the Colorado State Patrol said.

United Airlines averts strike

CHICAGO — United Airlines and the union representing 21,000 mechanics and ground workers reached a tentative contract agreement late Sunday, averting a nationwide strike that threatened to shut down the giant carrier, a union official said.

The agreement was reached in Washington, D.C., by negotiators for United and the International Association of Machinists just hours before the expiration of a 30-day "cooling-off" period barring a walkout.

Richard Delancy, president of union Local 1487, said in Chicago that he was notified of the agreement but had no details of the proposed contract.

Kassebaum apologizes to Dole

WASHINGTON — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., said Friday she has apologized to fellow Kansan Bob Dole for critical comments she made about him in a published report.

"It isn't any big deal," Kassebaum said in an interview.

"Dole and I understand it perfectly."

Kassebaum stood by the remarks that appeared last Sunday in The New York Times Magazine, saying they are accurate and represent a frank assessment of what she sees as his leadership weaknesses. However, she contended that her comments were taken out of context because she had talked at length about Dole's strengths and none of the balancing remarks were included in the story.

She has sent a letter to the editor of the magazine to "correct a misimpression" her remarks had left.

Kassebaum's quotation appeared near the beginning of the story, which profiled the Senate minority leader who formally announced this week his candidacy for the GOP presidential nomination. She was quoted: "Bob waits to see which way the wind is blowing. There's always a question: Does he have a vision? You won't see him creating an agenda."

Dole said during an interview on the Public Broadcast System earlier this week that there is such a perception of him.

Kassebaum, who is supporting Dole's presidential bid, says she "really tremendously admires" Dole for his ability as a legislative leader to produce results by bringing together people with diverse views and developing a consensus on issues. But she said those same attributes help explain why Dole "has just tended to not necessarily set the agenda."

"Personally, I feel even stronger in my support of Bob and my admiration for him recognizing that as a matter of fact there are times I wish he would lead the charge," she said. "But that isn't particularly his nature nor is it maybe even the necessary skill in his instance."

Dust is no match for some NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Seventy-two hotel employees tucked, folded, squirted and vacuumed their way through the "World Series of Housekeeping" in hopes of being called the city's best.

Housekeepers from 12 city hotels screamed and chanted Saturday throughout the 4½-hour contest with the theme "Another One Fights the Dust." The six-member teams competed for a first prize of $100 apiece.

The "Big Bed Makeoff" was won by Cynthia Cook, a room inspector for two years at the sponsoring Opryland Hotel.

"I am so happy — I don't have to look for another job now," she hollered after the victory.

Bubba Bright, a houseman at Maxwell House, attributed his team's win in the "Attack of the Killer Vacs" to practice sessions at work and at home. He put an industrial vacuum cleaner back together after teammate Earl Ticey disassembled it. Their time: 40 seconds.

Russel Stutler of Opryland wiped out a two-year champ in the "Blazing Bottles" event in which contestants try to spray whipped cream off an opponent's shoulder with a spray bottle.

And then there was something called "Mad Max Beyond Thunder Bucket," in which contestants sat in a wheeled mop bucket while a teammate pulled them through an obstacle course. It was won by the Maxwell House team.

Team reviews college Reaccreditation looks 'positive'

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Collegian Reporter

The response of the accreditation team to 10 of the College of Engineering's academic programs was described as "very positive" by Donald Rathbone, dean of the college.

Although the final decision for granting reaccreditation will not be announced until summer of 1988, Rathbone said he is confident all of the programs reviewed will either retain or initially receive accredited status.

The programs in the College of Engineering are accredited by the Accreditation Board for Engineering and Technology. Members of ABET's accreditation team visited K-State Nov. 1-3.

The departments of Agricultural Engineering, Architectural Engineering, Chemical Engineering, Civil Engineering, Electrical Engineering, Industrial Engineering, Mechanical Engineering and Nuclear Engineering were all reviewed for reaccreditation, Rathbone said.

One new program in the College of Engineering, the manufacturing option in the Department of Industrial Engineering, was reviewed last week for the first time, seeking initial accreditation, he said. The other new program, computer engineering, cannot be accredited until a graduate comes out of the program; then the accreditation will be received retroactively. Both programs are 2 years old.

Frank Tillman, head of the Department of Industrial Engineering, said he believed the review for initial accreditation of the manufacturing option went well.

"It's a new program, and you're never quite sure what the team is looking for, but we're optimistic," Tillman said.

Donald Hummels, head of the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering, expressed the same sentiment concerning the programs reviewed in that department.

"I have no real worries," Hummels said. "I'm not concerned about the outcome."

Rathbone said the review team expressed few concerns about any of the college's departments.

"As always, they (the review board members) are concerned about our equipment situation and whatever long-range plan we have for keeping our research and classroom facilities properly equipped," Rathbone said. "With us, it's really not a problem at all. They just wanted to make sure we had a long-range plan for that purpose."

O'Neill transfers to Boston for surgery

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Former House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill Jr. left a Washington hospital Sunday and was admitted to a Boston hospital for surgery, hospital officials said.

O'Neill is scheduled to undergo surgery of the rectum in several days, said Kathleen O'Donnell, spokeswoman for Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston. It is premature to say whether the surgery is for cancer, she said.

Reports Saturday in The Boston Globe and The Boston Herald said O'Neill has cancer of the large intestine. The Globe, quoting an unidentified source close to the family, said the former speaker would undergo a biopsy this week that would determine whether a section of his bowel should be surgically removed or treated with radiation.

O'Neill's son declined comment on the published reports.

"He's in good spirits. He's feeling fine. He's walking around," Christopher R. "Kip" O'Neill, a Washington attorney, said Saturday.

But he referred to statements made by his brother, Thomas P. O'Neill III, who said Friday that news reports that his father had cancer were not correct.

Texas tornadoes kill 7, leave 57 others injured

By The Associated Press

CALDWELL, Texas — Tornadoes swept across more than 200 miles of eastern Texas on Sunday, damaging scores of homes and buildings, downing power lines and leaving seven people dead and at least 57 injured.

Heavy destruction extended from east-central Texas just west of Austin to the Tyler area, in the state's northeast corner. Sixty-five Texas counties remained under tornado watch or warning Sunday night, as well as parts of northern Louisiana and central and southern Arkansas.

In Louisiana, one of several tornadoes that swept through the northwest corner of the state brought down the roof of a convenience store in Shreveport, authorities said.

Two or three people were trapped inside the Charter Food Store when the roof collapsed about 7 p.m., said a Caddo Parish deputy who refused to identify himself. The extent of injuries was not known, but there apparently were no fatalities, he said.

Two people were killed in Caldwell, about 60 miles northeast of Austin, and eight were injured when a twister cut a 16-mile swath through Burleson County, officials said. An undetermined number of people were missing, authorities said.

Caldwell Mayor William Broadus said that in the tornado's half-mile-wide path "the destruction is total."

"What is left of homes is nothing more than the concrete foundations," Broadus said. "The metal and wood from barns ... siding is up in the trees for miles."

Two people were killed in Nor-mangee, about 50 miles northeast of Caldwell, when a tornado touched down shortly after 2 p.m., said Margaret Haislip, a sheriff's dispatcher in Madison County. Two others were injured, she said.

Football 'tradition' deserves revamping

I grew up a football fan of the Kansas City Chiefs, and since 1982 I've also been a K-State Wildcat football fan. It amazes me that people wonder where my optimistic streak comes from.

Good-bye optimism, hello realism. K-State leads the nation in college football losses. Since FDR was president, our average record is eight losses for every three wins. All the contrived hope, alumni barbecues and pre-season Collegian publicity are not going to produce a Big Eight football powerhouse in Manhattan.

Instead of struggling against the inevitable, it's time K-State starts rolling with it.

Disbanding the football team and allocating all the money to Farrell Library sounds like a nice idea. So does eliminating all the world's armies and allocating the money to education and the poor. Leonid Brezhnev once said: "There is a deep-seated inertia in all human activities."

That seems to apply to both military-industrial complexes and college football — especially when there is money to be made. Believe it or not, K-State actually makes money from Big Eight football. Not from our football, mind you, but from those other teams. You see, we get to share revenues with the likes of Oklahoma, Nebraska and the other Big Eight teams.

We could simply economize. Why not eliminate all football scholarships and halve the coaching staff? It's not like these expenses are producing any positive results. Cut expenses, collect our cut from the overall Big Eight revenues and increase our profit margin.

No, that won't work either. If K-State doesn't at least maintain the charade of a football program, we'll soon get kicked out of the Big Eight, and there go those sports' revenues — revenues which, by the way, go

Commentary

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

to support non-revenue athletics like volleyball and track.

What is needed is a plan that draws genuine interest to K-State football, keeps us in the big bucks of the Big Eight and emphasizes the most dependable feature of Wildcat football — which is, of course, its propensity to lose on a regular basis.

The four worst teams in college football are K-State, Northwestern, Columbia and the University of California at Berkeley. If you ask me, it wouldn't be such a bad thing to associate K-State with the latter three institutions. Not because they're pigskin powerhouses, but because they are three of the finest academic institutions in the world.

What K-State should do is get Columbia,

Berkeley and Northwestern on the pre-season schedule.

Those schools have their priorities straight: Worry about providing a first-class education and let the footballs fall where they may. Academics is why we're here, right? Or is K-State really just a glorified high school, baby-sitting the youth of America's middle class with fight songs and homecoming parades?

Think of the advantages playing those teams would provide for our University! Instead of performing as practice patsies for the teams we play now in pre-season — Army, Iowa and Tulsa — we could face teams which are in our class and maybe enjoy a winning pre-season.

But winning isn't the point; associating K-State with universities which excel academically is. The publicity for our university would be a lot better if we play Northwestern or Harvard than if we play Army or Austin Peay.

Think about the interest we could draw for road games! Where would you rather travel to see the 'Cats play — to Iowa City, West Point and Tulsa or to San Francisco, Chicago and New York? A road trip to the Big Apple is going to draw a lot more alumni interest than a barbecue in Wichita.

By changing the pre-season schedule to face these teams, K-State would be boldly demonstrating its dedication to the claim made by every university, including Oklahoma and Nebraska: Academics comes first, sports second. Columbia actually exploits its lousy football record to raise money for its huge academic endowment.

Of course, as is the case with any bold redirection of priorities, resistance can be expected. Some alums will wave their checkbooks and scream about Wildcat loyalty. As is usually the case when conservatives talk about "loyalty," a more realistic noun is "pigheadedness." With a little courage and creativity, K-State could produce results which would fill the other Big Eight schools with envy.

And it's not like I'm talking about trashing our football program. I like football. I happen to think it's about the most interesting sport in the world. But every autumn, hopes are falsely raised about Wildcat football, then reality wakes us up and everyone is depressed. Maybe a little creative scheduling can improve the quality of education at K-State, upgrade the image of this institution and actually make going to the games fun.

Water contamination is becoming pervasive

Try as hard as they may to keep the modern world at bay, the predominantly Amish and Mennonite residents of Yoder in southcentral Kansas are faced with the unpleasant byproduct of an industrialized society: water contamination.

The Environmental Protection Agency has confirmed that some private wells in the village are contaminated, thereby qualifying it as an "immediate action site" for the agency's Superfund program. Such a site designation is made when immediate action is necessary to protect public health and safety.

Officials from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment concluded after random testing that some Yoder wells were contaminated with kerosene, and at least one private well was contaminated with carbon tetrachloride, a potential carcinogen that also can cause liver or kidney damage.

Although the presence of water contamination in Yoder is indeed ironical, it is certainly not unique as far as Kansas is concerned. A number of the state's communities, Manhattan included, are faced with the dilemma of what to do about unfit water.

Random testing by KDHE of 104 private wells last year revealed that seven contained pesticides, three contained volatile organic chemicals and 38 contained inorganic elements, such as nitrates, lead and fluoride, in amounts KDHE found unsafe.

The most logical conclusion in nearly every contamination case is to provide water from a nearby, uncontaminated source. However, to do that requires a great deal of money — normally more than is available.

For instance, to run water pipelines into Yoder from the Reno County Rural Water District would cost at least $200,000. And the Riley County Commission approved in late August a bid of more than $40,000 to construct a water district in Moehlman Bottoms, where several wells have been contaminated.

In case anyone was unconvinced, these figures prove that righting one of man's errors is no cheap task.

However, despite the usually exorbitant costs, the state and federal governments must find a way to remedy the problems as soon as possible. Human lives are at stake, and the price if one is lost because of foul water is one no one is prepared to pay.

"Everything's on the table."

Superpowers must quit masking everything as East-West conflict

Many people I have met from other countries like to depict the United States as an imperial power. This notion tends to be rejected by most Americans, with the exception of the more militant right wingers like Jesse Helms and Pat Robertson, who actively advocate empire building. But these people from other countries have a perspective on this phenomenon that most Americans don't have: that of being the people caught in the middle of the fight between empires.

Ronald Reagan's philosophy on foreign policy really reflects this reality of imperial struggle. In his eyes, you are either pro-American or pro-Soviet Union. This allows him to neatly divide the world into "ours" and "theirs," thereby allowing him to work only four hours a day. According to Reagan, there is no room in his world for non-aligned countries.

America's imperial inclinations have a long history. We can start with the campaigns against the American Indians, which can more accurately be described as genocide. In fact, these campaigns had much in common with Hitler's battles against the Jews, except we called our concentration camps "reservations," and we were more successful at it. The Indians' struggle for freedom ended Dec. 29, 1890, at Wounded Knee, S.D., thereby making the West "safe" for settlement.

With its "success" against the Indians, America took its act on the road. During the Spanish-American War, we took some colonies away from Spain and incorporated them into our own empire. One of these colonies is Puerto Rico, which still holds much the same status today. Another was the Philippines, where U.S. Marines were in some cases ordered to kill every Filipino male over 10 years old. This shows our objective was not just to kick the Spanish out, but to steal the colony away for ourselves.

Commentary

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

After this the United States became very active in securing their empire. U.S. forces were directly used in Nicaragua, Haiti, The Dominican Republic, Mexico, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos and Grenada just to name a few. Proxy forces and mercenaries were used against the people of Colombia, Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay, El Salvador, Guatemala, The Congo, Angola, Indonesia, East Timor, Brazil, Venezuela, China, Cuba, Iran, Greece, Uruguay and Botswana. I'm sorry if I left any countries out, but the CIA is not very loose with its information.

But then on the other side is the Soviet Union and its empire. They have not been quite as active as the Americans, a fact that is lost in the American media. According to a study conducted under the auspices of the Rockefeller Foundation, there have been 125 major military conflicts since World War II, 95 percent of these in Third World countries. Of these conflicts, the United States and Western Europe (junior partner in America's empire) were involved in 79 percent of these, while the Communist bloc nations accounted for 6 percent. It's not that the Soviets are any better, it's just that they don't interfere as much as the United States.

We very rarely get to hear from the people of the Third World who bear most of the brunt of this East-West conflict. These people must conform to the wishes of their superpower masters or suffer the consequences. To them, it is not so much an East-West conflict as it is a North-South conflict, the developed versus the underdeveloped world. The ideologies may differ, but the reality of being a colony of the North doesn't change.

We can see these problems anytime we pick up the paper or turn on the television. The Americans and the Soviets both justify their aggressions against the underdeveloped world by playing up the East-West conflict. The Soviets justify their actions in Afghanistan by claiming self-defense from the American-equipped rebels, while the United States justifies its war against Nicaragua by claiming self-defense from the Soviet-backed Sandinistas. As long as they can justify their actions as defense against the enemy, both superpowers will spread their violence freely and indiscriminately around the world promising freedom and delivering misery.

Americans need to educate themselves about these issues and get away from the misleading labels and accusations that are tossed about by smiling politicians. It is time to get away from this Joe McCarthy-style cold war rhetoric and get down to the real facts. The Third World is never going to get anywhere if we keep fighting over it like two parents in a custody battle. If you ask me, I think the superpowers are the ones acting like children who need to be disciplined before they destroy the neighborhood.

Population research lab aids studies

By Sally Neary
Collegian Reporter

Number of small farms scrutinized

Providing information, providing skills and conducting research are the functions of the population research laboratory, a sub-institution under the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work.

The population laboratory can be divided into two parts — demography, or population studies, and ecological research, said Tin-Yu Ting, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology and social work. Ecological research is a broader term which includes studying aspects such as fertility or racial and urban issues.

The laboratory provides a library which supplies information to people in Kansas and other states, he said. "We receive letters and phone calls from various institutions or individual citizens asking for census information," Ting said.

"We reply over the telephone or conduct research analysis," he said. "Unless it (the research) takes some real effort, we don't charge people."

He said the department wants to expand the range of the population laboratory on campus by conducting survey research for the community and the state.

"As sociologists, we should be able to provide other skills to the community," Ting said.

"Population is important because all social phenomenon is a result of population," he said. "As sociologists and social scientists, studying population is very interesting, and that's the basic force behind social change."

People in rural studies or the Agricultural Experiment Station phone the laboratory and ask for information, Ting said.

"We have collections of information from Kansas and other states, so we can provide them," he said.

A set of population and ecology courses are offered to students who use the library to conduct their research, Ting said. Students at the master or doctorate level can select population or ecology as their major area of concentration for dissertations or masters' theses.

"In the last several years, there have been a number of good dissertations and masters' theses produced here," Ting said.

Julie Zimmerman, a former K-State student, did a cross-national study of fertility crime in the 1970s concentrating on Third World countries for her master's thesis. After receiving her master's degree from K-State, she received a four-year scholarship from Brown University.

"This is a very honorable award," Ting said. "It shows the quality of our education in population here on campus."

"We have very good masters and Ph.D. programs; they have a good future of study here at K-State," he said.

Ting and three colleagues are currently conducting their own research for a project. Ting was in charge of the first stage of this project, "The Determinants of the Increasing Number of Small Farms in Kansas."

"In the last eight years we've seen an increasing number of small farms in Kansas and the United States as a whole," Ting said.

Studies have also shown an increasing number of corporate farms and a decreasing number of family farms.

"Family farms have been the traditional or the backbone of U.S. agriculture," Ting said. "If the phenomenon is related to the decreasing number of farm families, we can start to worry about the backbone of U.S. agriculture."

Ting said the first stage of the project involved analyzing a percentage of small farms in Kansas' 105 counties to determine the factors contributing to their increasing numbers. The researchers looked for any demographic impact such as an out-migration of people or the decentralization of manufacturing and service industries.

The second stage of the project will begin early next year. Researchers will select six to eight western counties in Kansas which are adjacent to metropolitan counties and interview the small farmers there.

The researchers will also be looking at the problems the farmers are facing and if the farmers need an agricultural experiment station or state agricultural agency to help them.

"We hope we can play a role as a survey research laboratory for the state of Kansas," Ting said.

Bombay fire kills at least 3, injures 30

By The Associated Press

BOMBAY, India — A fire raged through a Bombay slum, killing at least three people and leaving 10,000 homeless, officials said Sunday.

The Saturday night blaze burned down about 2,000 shanties in an area of four square miles, Fire Chief Vijay Vaidya said. He said at least 30 people were injured.

The body of a woman was found in the ruins of her home. Two men were hit by a train and killed while trying to flee the flames.

Women qualify for NCAA meet

By Chase Clark
Sports Writer

COLUMBIA, Mo. — It was close, but for the fourth straight year, the K-State women's cross country team is going to the NCAA Championships.

Saturday, at the A.L. Gustin Golf Course in Columbia, Mo., the K-State women's cross country team placed second at the NCAA District V Meet. The K-State men's squad placed fourth, but will not be going to the National Championships.

"I'm really proud of both teams," K-State Coach John Capriotti said. "For the fourth year in a row, the women are going to nationals. The women did a great job."

"(The women) ran bad in the Big Eight Conference meet, and people kind of counted us out. Our backs were against the wall and we knew it. We knew it would be close, and after placing third at the conference championship behind Colorado and Nebraska, we knew we had to do better to go to nationals. We belong (at nationals) and hopefully we'll be back in the Top 20 where we should have been all along," Capriotti said.

At the District V Meet, Colorado won top honors with 52 points. K-State came in second overall with 71 points and Nebraska placed third with 75 points.

Colorado and K-State will compete at the National Championships Nov. 23 at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville, Va. with 14 other universities.

Oklahoma State's Jackie Goodman came in first with a time of 17:07.7. Nebraska's Sammie Resh

"...we knew we had to do better to go to nationals. We belong (at nationals) and hopefully we'll be back in the Top 20 where we should have been all along."

—John Capriotti

placed second and Southern Illinois' Vivian Sinou came in third. Goodman, Resh and Sinou will compete individually at the National Championships.

Leading the charge for K-State on the 5,000-meter course was junior Laura Haggerty in fourth place overall with a time of 17:32.9. Senior Anne Stadler came in 10th at 18:22.5. Freshman Jenny Faunce placed 15th, sophomore Becky Ives came in 20th and sophomore Marge Eddy rounded out the team scoring at 22nd. Senior Alysun Deckert and freshman Tammy Van Laeys also ran for K-State and placed 26th and 36th respectively.

Deckert had an off day, but the other runners compensated for her, Capriotti said.

"Alysun Deckert had a bad day, but the other runners knew it and came through," Capriotti said. "Alysun is an experienced runner and I'm sure she will run well at nationals."

Even though K-State's men's team didn't finish in the top two teams and will not be advancing to the National Championships, Capriotti was very pleased with their performance.

"The men just had a phenomenal day," Capriotti said. "They came in fourth and just missed qualifying by 20 points. They ran the best race I have ever seen a men's team run at K-State. I guarantee the next couple of years, K-State will be a team to be reckoned with."

Colorado's men's team finished first overall with 80 points. Nebraska was second with 82 points, Iowa State came in third with 84 points and K-State was fourth with 112 points.

"(The men) have learned to deal with adversity, and when the chips were down, they never gave up," Capriotti said. "(Junior) Brian Zwahlen ran a great race for us. This is the first time he has run cross country. He's basically a track man."

Individually for K-State, Zwahlen finished 13th on the 10,000-meter course with a time of 32:27.9. Sophomore David Keller placed 16th, Phil Byrne came in 20th, junior Daryl Reichard finished 21st and freshman Joe Bonneau placed 42nd. Junior Jeff Shelar and freshman Tom Mitchell also ran for K-State and finished 54th and 71st respectively.

Colorado and Nebraska will compete as teams at the National Championships. Iowa State's Barnaba Korir and Darrell Smith, and Oklahoma's Noel Berkeley will compete individually at the Championships. Korir finished first with a time of 30:53.25; Smith placed fourth with a time of 31:22.1 and Berkeley finished fifth with a time of 31:26.4.

Wildcats come close to gaining first victory at ISU

K-State players Jim Oehm (78) and Lorne Whittle (49), pull down Iowa State running back Joe Henderson in the second half of Saturday's football game in Ames, Iowa. K-State lost to the Cyclones, 16-14.

Sports Writer

AMES, Iowa — Iowa State's freshman place kicker Jeff Shudak gave himself the ultimate birthday present Saturday in the game against K-State.

Shudak's 39-yard field goal into the wind with 46 seconds left in the game gave the Cyclones a come-from-behind, 16-14 victory over the winless Wildcats. He said the kick was a confidence builder, because he had missed an identical try last week against Nebraska.

"Yeah, I was thinking about the Nebraska game when I missed a 39-yarder into the wind," Shudak said. "But I thought all I have to do is hit it straight, make good contact...that's what I did and it went through."

ISU Coach Jim Walden was just as impressed with Shudak's following kickoff which left the Wildcats 82 yards from their end zone with just 40 seconds to play.

"He hit the best kickoff against the wind that you would ever want to see," Walden said. "If he wouldn't have hit that that good, (K-State) could have been in field goal range."

K-State may be winless, but the 'Cats can't be called boring. As in the game against the University of Kansas, the 'Cats took it down to the wire. Following Shudak's kick, K-State drove to the 50 before senior linebacker Chris Moore picked off a Gary Swim pass to ensure the win.

"I saw it was a tight end curl. We've been practicing that pattern all week in practice, and I had been getting a few (interceptions) in practice. I just waited, went for it and came up with it," Moore said.

For Swim, it was a black mark on a near-perfect performance.

"I was looking to get us into decent field goal range...and I saw the tight end open," Swim said. "Their linebacker made a helluva play and stepped in front of it. I guess I should have thrown it out of bounds and came back with another play."

Swim finished the day with 241 yards, completing 19-of-27 attempts. Swim's efforts are even more impressive considering the fact that he hyperextended a knee late in the first half.

K-State, 0-9-1 overall and 0-5-1 in the Big Eight Conference, drove 80 yards in 11 plays early in the first quarter to take a 7-0 lead. Swim had a hot hand in the drive, completing two 16-yard passes to wide receiver Dan Hughes and a 22-yard scoring toss to tight end Kent Dean.

Iowa State, 3-7 overall and 2-4 in the Big Eight, answered the call by driving 51 yards in 12 plays and scoring on Shudak's 35-yard field goal. It was Shudak's 16th field goal of the season, and it broke a Cyclone record which had stood for 14 seasons.

The Cyclones took the lead for the first time in the game in the second half by engineering an 80-yard, 11-play touchdown drive. Junior running back Joe Henderson was ISU's catalyst by gaining 59 yards on that drive alone and scoring from 23 yards out.

Henderson finished the day with 190 yards and has 1,058 on the season. He is the first ISU back to gain more than 1,000 yards since Dwayne Crutchfield accomplished that feat in 1971.

"It's a good thing we have Joe Henderson. I lost confidence in even trying to pass. We just went to the run. We said if we don't win it with Joe, we ain't got a chance," Walden said.

Shudak built Iowa State's lead to 13-7 with a 38-yard field goal late in the third quarter following Mark Porter's missed field goal attempt from 21 yards out.

Porter, who had made eight straight before missing his first attempt of the year against Oklahoma, thought the field goal was good.

"I didn't hit it that well, but I thought it went through in my opinion," Porter said. "I ran over to the back judge right after the kick...and said, 'You've got to call that good,' but the (referees) just ignored me. I'm sure they played a lot closer attention to (ISU's) last field goal."

Porter has had a rough go of it the last two weeks, missing three field goal attempts and having the potential game winner against Kansas blocked.

"My confidence isn't that bad, but this whole year has just gone to (pot)

Netters win once

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State women's tennis team won only one match in the Rolex ITCA regional tennis tournament at The Wichita State University over the weekend.

The victory came in doubles as Sigrid Ivarsson and Annika Emtell defeated Fink-Jenfén and Branlett of Brigham Young University, 7-6, 6-4.

"Everyone was disappointed with their singles play," said K-State head coach Steve Bietau. "We (could have won) four matches today, but we just didn't take advantage of them."

No team scores were kept in the tournament, with teams being paired at random for competition.

Brigham Young avenged its loss to K-State, as the doubles team of Lee and Noot defeated Thresa Burcham and Mistee Bitner 6-1, 6-1.

"Burcham and Bitner played very good against a team ranked 10th nationally. They made them work for every point," Bietau said.

Burcham was also defeated in singles play by Stacey Stotts of Kansas 6-1, 6-2 in singles play.

'Air Parrish' makes return

By Jeff Rapp
Sports Editor

AMES, Iowa — It has been said that one lives by the sword and dies by the sword. So goes the story of K-State football coach Stan Parrish and his small army of football players.

A new 241-yard chapter was added to the "to throw or not to throw" saga here Saturday via the arm of junior Wildcat quarterback Gary Swim. And with most of the help coming from seniors wide receiver Dan Hughes and tight end Kent Dean, it looked like that chapter would end happily.

Unfortunately for K-State, however, what could have been a triumphant resurgence for "Air Parrish" turned to a bittersweet melodrama, as the 'Cats took a hard-fought 16-14 loss back to Manhattan.

Swim had a sparkling day, completing 19-of-27 passing attempts for 241 yards, connecting with Hughes seven times for 95 yards and hitting Dean six times for 85 yards. But just when the "sword" of the aerial attack looked sharpened and ready to slice victory away from Iowa State, the Cyclones snatched it away.

With 49 seconds left in the game, the situation lended itself perfectly to the kind of day Swim and the offense had been having. The Cyclones' Jeff Shudak had just kicked a 39-yard field goal into the wind, and the Wildcats — with that same strong wind behind them — were driving for a final field goal try that would allow them to win by one point.

The 'Cats appeared to be rising to the occasion after taking over on their own 18-yard line, as Swim completed passes good for 17 and 15 yards to Hughes and Tony Jordan, respectively.

That put K-State on the 50-yard line with 24 seconds remaining — plenty of time for two or three more plays to gain a few more yards to get into field goal position. And just in the nick of time to allow senior placekicker Mark Porter to redeem himself for a missed 21-yard chip shot in the third quarter.

Incidentally, Porter said the missed field goal was not actually a miss, in his opinion. Nevertheless, Porter wanted one last shot at the end of the game.

"I would have rather gotten one there at the end (of the game), because I felt real good in warm-ups kicking in that direction."

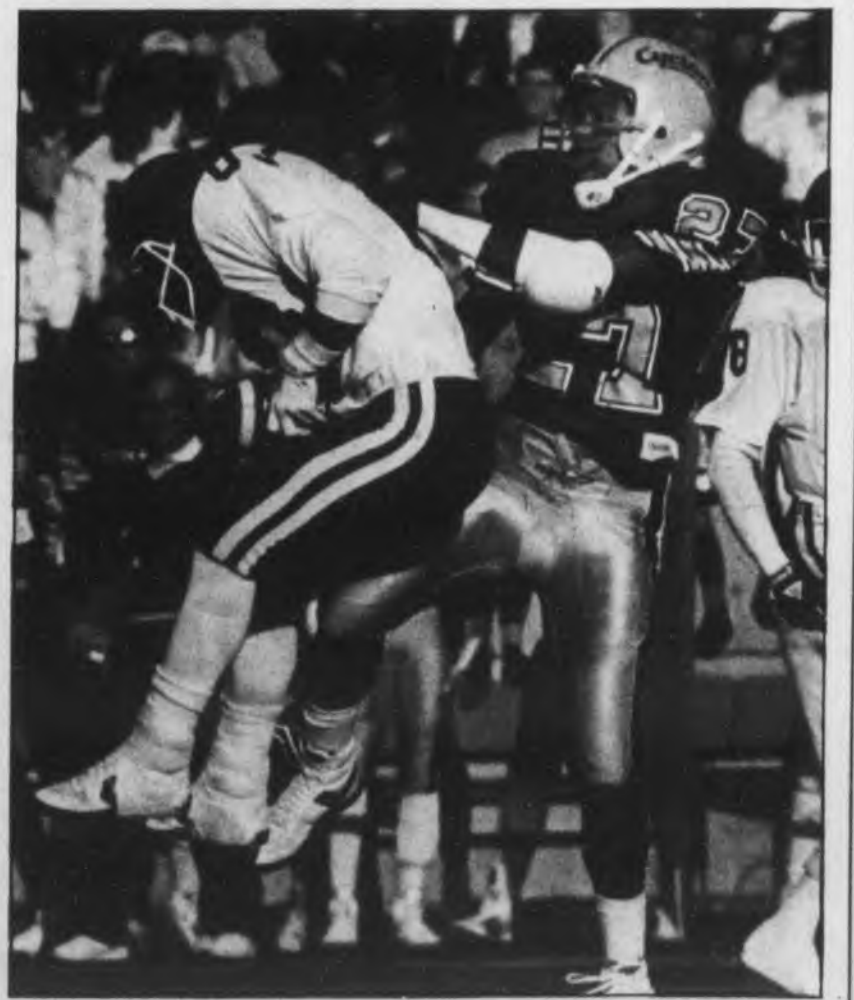

Porter must have felt good with the 20 mph wind behind his back, because before the game with punter Shane Pouch holding and a sparse pre-game crowd observing, Porter nailed a 60-yarder.

Porter, however, was stripped of the chance to make amends for his miscue, when the final blow was dealt by Cyclone linebacker Chris Moore.

Swim, looking for those few more precious yards to get within Porter's range, dropped back in the pocket, reared back and threw in the direction of senior tight end Brent Cotton. Moore, however, dove from behind Cotton and snatched the ball as he fell to the ground.

The passing game, looking as though it would be a shiny sword in Parrish's sheath — as he had planned it upon his arrival at K-

Basketball team coasts by Spirit Express team, 88-51

By Bill Long
Sports Writer

For some people, Saturday signaled the beginning of hunting season. For K-State head basketball coach Lon Kruger, it signaled the start of a new basketball campaign and the hunt for a Big Eight Conference title.

K-State routed the Spirit Express, 88-51, in an exhibition game Saturday night in Ahearn Field House in front of about 3,500 faithful fans.

Kruger said the Wildcats went out and played the way they had practiced the last few weeks.

"We've been having some good practices," Kruger said. "We had to have the good playing go over into the game for us sometime. We didn't do bad."

Leading the way for K-State was senior forward Mitch Richmond. Richmond scored 21 points on 9-of-13 shooting, grabbed five rebounds and had one blocked shot. Following Richmond were junior guard Rene (Buster) Glover with 17 points, nine of those via the three-point line, and sophomore guard Steve Henson added nine points.

Although Richmond is this year's main man, Glover received high praise from Kruger.

"(Buster) really used his quickness as an advantage," Kruger said. "He made some awfully good plays and didn't make very many bad decisions."

Glover added that the confidence level he had was the determining factor in his play.

"I felt that I had a lot of confidence tonight," he said. "Coach told me to go out and play my game and I did that."

"When I go out I look to get a lot of assists first," he added. "Then take my shots when they come."

In the game, Spirit Express' forward Fred Gilliam scored the first two points of the contest to help the visitors take their first lead and last lead of the game.

Senior forward Charles Bledsoe, after being fouled by Carl Gonder, connected on his two foul shots to tie the ball game at two at the 18:36 mark.

After Bledsoe's foul shots the 'Cats scored 10 straight points while the Express was held scoreless.

At the 12:34 mark, Lonnie Lewis of the Express scored two from the lane to pull the Express within six, 15-9.

"I felt that I had a lot of confidence tonight. Coach told me to go out and play my game and I did that....When I go out I look to get a lot of assists first, then I take my shots when they come."

—Buster Glover

After that, Kruger started substituting freely and the 'Cats coasted to 45-29 lead at intermission.

In the second half, K-State didn't show any signs of letting up the pace they had established.

The 'Cats and the Express started out sluggishly, scoring only six points apiece in the first three minutes of play, to make the score 51-35.

From there on it was all K-State. In nearly 11 minutes of play K-State had outscored the Express 23-1 to take a commanding 72-37 lead.

After more substitutions by the K-State bench the 'Cats coasted into the 88-51 victory.

The key factor to the 'Cats two scoring binges can be traced to the play of Bledsoe.

Bledsoe, in the first half, hauled down nine rebounds and finished the night with 14 caroms.

"Charles had spring in his legs tonight," Kruger said. "He went into the game and just played hard ball, and he fought for his position and did well."

Kruger also praised the play of freshman center John Rettiger.

"He played with some pretty good poise," Kruger said. "You expect a transition period from someone out of high school not used to playing with bigger guys. But he's learning what he has to do to become a Big Eight player."

Kruger added that the game was much better for the players than the intrasquad scrimmages they have been having.

"We really got a lot of things from the game that you look to get from an exhibition," he said. "It's a dress rehearsal, a good chance to line up in front of some different people. The game serves as preparation. We were looking to play like we practice, and we did a good job of that."

Leading the way for the Express was Russ Pennell, formerly with Central Arkansas, with 23 points. Pennell made a homecoming of sorts, being a native of Pittsburg, Kan. He also graduated from the same high school as Wildcat senior guard Mark Nelson.

Also scoring for the Express were Lonnie Lewis with 8 points and Fred Gilliam with 7 points.

Besides Glover and Richmond, no other K-State player scored in double figures. Freshman center John Rettiger, junior transfer Fred McCoy, senior center Ron Meyer, senior forward Charles Bledsoe and junior guard Mark Dobbins all tallied six points each.

College bowl picture begins to take shape

Thanksgiving approaches, and with my last little thirst for baseball having been quenched by the Royals' recent trade for a shortstop, college football takes center stage for me in the world of sports.

Bowl bids won't officially be extended until this Saturday, but this season's postseason lineup is almost set, according to a report released Sunday by The Associated Press.

Sources told The AP that Miami will meet either No. 1 Oklahoma or No. 2 Nebraska in the Orange Bowl; No. 6 Syracuse will face the Southeastern Conference representative (likely Auburn) in the Sugar Bowl; and No. 7 Notre Dame will meet the Southwestern Conference champion (likely Texas A&M) in the Cotton Bowl.

In other New Year's bowl games, the report said, No. 15 Penn State will play ninth-ranked Clemson in the Citrus; No. 4 Florida State will face the loser of this Saturday's Oklahoma-Nebraska game in the Fiesta; and No. 13 Michigan State will play the winner of Saturday's Southern California-UCLA game (likely UCLA) in the Rose.

Third-ranked Miami, which beat

Virginia Tech Saturday to go 8-0, still has to play Toledo, Notre Dame and South Carolina. If the Hurricanes win those games, it could set up a national title game against the Oklahoma-Nebraska winner.

The same source that gave The AP its information as to who would meet and where also said that Miami will play in the Orange Bowl even if the Hurricanes lose one or more of their remaining games.

That idea, simply put, is ludicrous. If the Orange Bowl is truly to determine a national champion, it needs to put the best two teams it can on the field Jan. 1.

The president of the Orange Bowl's selection committee maintains — much to his credit — that his panel will invite the highest-ranked team to play the Big Eight Conference champion.

"I'm totally confused by the rumors that I'm hearing," Pete Williams told The AP. "We've said all along we would probably invite the highest-ranked team under the circumstances."

A Cotton Bowl official said a contingency plan — which would send the winner of the Nov. 28 Miami-

Notre Dame game to the Orange Bowl and the loser to the Cotton Bowl — would be reconsidered if Fighting Irish Coach Lou Holtz insists on playing in the Orange.

If I were Holtz and I had just downed Miami, I'd scream until I was blue in the face for the opportunity to face Nebraska for the national title.

Oops, I let it slip. I do like Nebraska over Oklahoma this weekend. The 'Huskies just have too many guns for the Sooners to handle. That having been said, Oklahoma will probably romp to the win. I haven't been right in any prediction I've made this season, so why start now.

But where does all of this talk about Notre Dame and Miami leave Syracuse, a team that will finish the regular season 11-0 with a win over West Virginia, Saturday?

If Notre Dame does indeed knock off Miami, both the Fighting Irish and Hurricanes will have a loss. The Orangemen, however, would still be unbeaten. Sounds to me like Syracuse should be the team facing Nebraska, not Notre Dame or Miami.

The Hurricanes could clear up a great deal of the controversy if they go out and beat Notre Dame and end the season undefeated, but the Irish have been very tough lately. Just ask anyone they've beaten up on.

Syracuse, regardless of my feelings, will play No. 12 Auburn in the Sugar Bowl if Auburn beats Alabama Nov. 27 to win the SEC title. If Auburn loses (which I think is highly unlikely with Alabama as inconsistent as it has been all year), Alabama and LSU would end up in a tie for the conference crown, and the Sugar Bowl would decide which team goes to New Orleans.

The two members of the SEC group that don't go the Sugar Bowl will likely fill spots in the Gator and Hall of Fame bowls.

Michigan State won the Big Ten championship and a trip to the Rose Bowl by beating No. 16 Indiana 27-3 Saturday. The Spartans will likely face UCLA, which thrashed Washington Saturday and appears far too much for USC to handle. The matchup between the Bruins and the Trojans, however, is a traditional rivalry, and should be a good one.

In other bowls, sources said, it will be Arkansas vs. Georgia in the Liberty, Tennessee vs. Indiana (the football team, not Bobby Knight's boys) in the Peach, and Air Force vs. Arizona State in the Freedom.

Also expected to square off will be Michigan vs. an SEC team in the Hall of Fame, South Carolina vs. an SEC team in the Gator, Iowa vs. the Western Athletic Conference champion in the Holiday, and former University of Kansas Coach Mike Gottfried and his Pitt Panthers vs. the Southwest Conference runner-up in the Bluebonnet.

It appears the committees have done their homework well and that this crop of bowl games, though still just speculative, could provide some great excitement.

since I missed my first field goal," Porter said.

K-State took the lead early in the fourth quarter when fullback Rick Lewis scored from one yard out.

Lewis ran the ball six straight times on the drive.

"We were doing real well on that inside play," Lewis said. "I don't know what they were doing on defense, but we were getting good holes on that play."

But Iowa State drove the ball 52 yards in 14 plays two possessions later to set up Shudak's game-winning field goal.

"(The loss) is hard to describe," Lewis said, "but when you have downers...all year, it's like I've got a callous on my brain. It was great on the sidelines after I scored that last touchdown and we were ahead...but that all came down to luck — (Shudak's) kick."

Parrish said he was more disappointed with this loss than with the tie against Kansas, but he praised the Wildcats' efforts.

"Hell, we were on the obituary page right after we played Kansas. But the kids came back and battled and played hard and didn't give up," Parrish said.

'Cat rugby team loses 'big game'

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

There was some good news and some very, very bad news for K-State's rugby team on Saturday at Gorman Park in Manhattan.

The Wildcat club side defeated the University of Kansas club side and the 'Cat's B-side upended its KU counterpart, but K-State's collegiate side was defeated in its Heart of America Championship match. As a result, the 'Cats won't advance to the Western Collegiate Territorial Championships for the first time in the 8-year history of the league.

The K-State club side put on a good show, outscoring the Jayhawks, 12-0. The B-side matchup also saw the Wildcats blank KU as it won, 14-0, with all of the scoring coming on tries and conversion kicks.

The season-ending loss dropped the Wildcats' season record to 8-9 and downed their hopes of continuing to the Western regionals for the eighth straight year.

"We've held the cup for seven years; set tradition for seven years that KU would not beat K-State," Barnes said. "There were tears on the sidelines when the guys realized that we wouldn't be making the trip (to the regionals) after seven years in a row of going."

had two tries, but as it was the whole thing was decided by (penalty) kicks.

"Their backline wasn't able to move the ball on us at all," Barnes added. "I think we had the superior team on the field, but it certainly wasn't reflected on the scoreboard."

"I was pleased with the way we played today," said Wildcat head coach Danny Blea. "We gave it a good effort all day long, playing with a lot of intensity and a lot of heart."

"Their kicker (Paul King) had a great day, but we lost because of our mistakes."

Barnes was the lone Wildcat to score, converting on two of three penalty kicks. The Jayhawks had more opportunities at the straightaway kicks, converting on three of 12 attempts.

The season-ending loss dropped the Wildcats' season record to 8-9 and downed their hopes of continuing to the Western regionals for the eighth straight year.

"We've held the cup for seven years; set tradition for seven years that KU would not beat K-State," Barnes said. "There were tears on the sidelines when the guys realized that we wouldn't be making the trip (to the regionals) after seven years in a row of going."

Jim Pitts (8), of the K-State rugby club, pulls down a member of the University of Kansas rugby team Saturday at Gorman Park in Manhattan. The club 'Cats defeated KU, 12-0.

State two years ago — instead represented the end of this chapter of the coach's two-win reign at K-State.

Parrish said although Swim made a crucial mistake, he didn't hold it against him.

"Well, you hate to remember the last play, because you could always throw (the pass) away and live for another down. But he hung in there today and played about as well as he has played all year long," Parrish said.

Getting tough

Gorbachev's reform in doubt

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev's dramatic break with one of his top lieutenants toughens his image in the weeks before a superpower summit, but casts doubt on how far his drive for reform can and will go.

The firing of Boris N. Yeltsin, the outspoken Moscow party boss, seems certain to temper the approach to "perestroika," Gorbachev's campaign for social and economic change that Yeltsin had vocally advocated.

By presiding over Yeltsin's downfall Wednesday, Gorbachev put his stamp on the ouster of his former protégé. It remains a question whether he did so to remove a volatile renegade or under pressure from the party's more conservative officials, reportedly led by Politburo member Yegor K. Ligachev.

Whatever Gorbachev's motives, the removal of the outspoken Yeltsin from the Moscow leadership post and two city government positions will bolster the course of "revolutionary restraint" espoused by Gorbachev in a Kremlin speech this month.

Yeltsin had developed an image, deserved or not, as a radical advocate of change within limits set by the Soviet one-party system.

His removal may inject a wariness among Soviet officials and citizens, who have been encouraged under the reforms to speak out and seek novel ways to solve their country's problems.

"Are the policies intact? Are people going to believe it when one of the most vigorous proponents falls by the wayside?" a Western diplomat asked Friday. "We'll have to wait and see."

He spoke on the condition of anonymity.

For almost two years, the dynamic, wavy-haired Yeltsin spearheaded calls for greater candor in society and efficiency in government and the economy.

The 56-year-old Yeltsin broached subjects that were once taboo, such as the existence of special food stores and services for the party and government elite. He used mass transit, and made unannounced visits to bread stores to see if the products being sold were fresh.

But in an Oct. 21 speech at a closed-door meeting of the party Central Committee, Yeltsin said the reform drive had stalled in the capital, criticized the leadership and offered his resignation.

On Wednesday, Yeltsin was brought before the Moscow party committee, accused of "major shortcomings" and fired in disgrace.

Speeches by Gorbachev and Moscow Communists rebuking Yeltsin were later published in extraordinary detail in Pravda, the party daily, apparently serving as his political obituary.

Subordinates accused Yeltsin of showboating, wrecking the party apparatus and blaming others for his faults. By reporting their comments, the party hierarchy seemed bent on eliminating support for Yeltsin among Soviet citizens.

However, Gorbachev and some other officials seemed concerned that the harsh treatment meted out to Yeltsin might make other functionaries balk before speaking their mind or acting, and moved to limit the damage.

"There must be in the party neither the areas closed to criticism nor officials immune against it," Gorbachev said. "The party will continue developing criticism and self-criticism at every level."

Yeltsin was dealt two more blows Saturday when the Moscow City Council stripped him of his duties as a member of the council's executive committee and as head of its Communist Party group.

On Dec. 7, Gorbachev is to begin his third summit meeting with President Reagan in Washington. The leaders have said they will sign a treaty eliminating intermediate-range nuclear missiles and discuss arms control and other issues.

The firing of Yeltsin should not affect the substance of the summit, since he was not involved in international affairs. But one Moscow official expressed concern Wednesday over the damage it could do to the Soviet Union's image.

Program cuts families' welfare

if teen-agers skip high school

By The Associated Press

MADISON, Wis. — Wisconsin is launching a first-of-its-kind program to cut a family's welfare benefits if a teen-ager skips school in an effort to keep one generation of welfare recipients from raising another.

State officials hope the program, known as learnfare, will shrink high school dropout rates and encourage inner-city youths who have already dropped out to return to classes. They note that people with high school diplomas spend on average half the time on welfare of those without a diploma.

However, critics say learnfare would penalize whole families for an unruly teen-ager and amounts to experimentation on society's most dependent.

"It's a win for the state, it's a win for the families, it's a win for the kids," Gov. Tommy G. Thompson said in a recent interview.

"It gives them an opportunity they wouldn't have by dropping out of school," said Thompson, who came up with the idea during his campaign for governor last year. "It's got to work."

"I see AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children — the major federal welfare program) as like a giant tranquilizer. We give them money but we dare not ask them to help themselves," said Timothy Cullen, tapped by Thompson to head the state Department of Health and Social Services.

Wisconsin is the only state to have received a waiver of federal welfare rules to try learnfare.

Under a compromise reached between Democratic legislators and the Republican Thompson administration last week, the families of about 12,000 teen-agers ages 13 and 14 will come under the learnfare program Jan. 1. The families of another 18,000 or so who are 15 years old or older will be subject to its provisions Sept. 1. There are about 300,000 people in the state on AFDC. Teen-agers 15 and older will be subject to the plan Jan. 1 if they are parents themselves.

Sanctions against families will be delayed for three months, and a family would only lose the share of its welfare grant that is for the truant youth.

Nicaragua's Ortega says he's attempting to comply with plan

By The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — Nicaragua's President Daniel Ortega made a surprise stop here on his way home from the United States and said he would brief President Miguel de la Madrid on a new Nicaraguan proposal for a truce in the Contra war.

"Now is a good time to exchange views with President Miguel de la Madrid, so he knows directly the steps my country is taking to comply with a Central American peace plan, he told reporters when he arrived at Mexico City airport Saturday.

Nicaraguan and Mexican officials declined to say what Ortega was doing on Sunday.

Nicaraguan Embassy spokesman Silvio Ordonez said Ortega, who was accompanied by first lady Rosario Murillo and their six children, went out for the day "to see the city." He declined to say where they went other than probably to Chapultepec Park, a vast city park.

Rosario Murillo and the children flew in Saturday from Managua, the Nicaraguan capital, to join him here.

The arrival of the Ortegas came as a complete surprise to Mexican officials.

"We know nothing about his activities. He arrived unexpectedly," Mario Enciso, the Foreign Ministry spokesman on duty, said Sunday. "We didn't know he was going to come."

A presidential press office official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Ortega will meet with de la Madrid today.

"It will probably be in the morning, probably at 9 a.m. But this is not certain yet," she said.

During his four days in Washington, Ortega proposed an 11-point plan for a cease-fire.

Nicaraguan Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo, who is acting as a mediator, was to present the proposal to the U.S.-supported Contra rebels.

The plan calls for a cease-fire to begin on Dec. 5 and for rebel troops inside Nicaragua to move to one of three cease-fire zones. The rebels would lay down their arms on Jan. 5 before independent observers, and then be granted amnesty.

Obando y Bravo, who stopped in Miami on his way back from Washington to talk informally to Contra leaders in the umbrella group called Nicaraguan Resistance, returned to Managua on Saturday night.

Obando y Bravo's spokesman, Monsignor Bismarck Carballo, said the Roman Catholic cardinal will hold a formal meeting with Contra leaders soon somewhere in Central America, but he refused to give details.

A peace plan which Ortega and the four other Central American presidents signed last Aug. 7 calls for cease-fires in Nicaragua's Contra war and the war waged by leftist guerrillas in El Salvador, along with national conciliation talks between governments and opposition groups.

REO Speedwagon plays to near sell out

Classics thrill enthusiastic Salina crowd

By Chuck Homer
Collegian Reporter

REO Speedwagon delivered its rock 'n' roll message to an appreciative audience Saturday night in the almost sold-out concert at the Bicentennial Center in Salina.

The crowd was on its feet and dancing in the aisles from the opening number by the warm-up band, Richard Marx, and never sat down through three hours of hard-driving rock 'n' roll.

The Richard Marx band, featuring its current hits, "Should've Known Better" and "Don't Mean Nothing," along with a mix of other songs from their album "RICHARD MARX," had the crowd yelling themselves hoarse from the first chord.

Concert Review

The audience got a surprise when it was revealed that Jon Walmsley, formerly known as "Jason" on the television series "The Waltons," was alive and well and playing lead guitar for Richard Marx on his current tour.

Walmsley, featured at center stage on several numbers, jammed hard on songs I know he didn't learn on Walton's Mountain.

A deafening, foot-stomping mandate from the audience brought Richard Marx and company back for an encore.

The band delivered with a rendition of the Rod Stewart classic "Stay With Me," flavored heavily with the sounds of saxophone and drums that typifies Richard Marx's music.

Marx randomly dispensed condoms to audience members by air delivery to match the air delivery of glow-in-the-dark, chemical lights that looped through the the air.

The six-member Richard Marx band was worth the price of admission alone, and the concert-goers response to their music validated the band's appeal to rock 'n' roll fans.

REO Speedwagon, arriving on stage out of the smoke of a Hollywood-like stage setting, got the audience's juices flowing on a musical platform of their classic tunes and a blend of songs from the band's latest album "Life As We Know It."

The opening tune "That Ain't Love" had an audience filled with air-guitarists, mimicking the efforts of lead vocalist and rhythm guitarist, Kevin Cronin.

The positive audience response to the band's new songs, like "New Way To Love" and "In My Dreams," showed that the band had transitioned their sound to the 80s, but the group's classics still evoked the greatest audience response.

The band's classics, "I Can't Fight This Feeling Anymore" and "Riding the Storm Out," had the audience dancing on its chairs and demanding more.

The flames of hundreds of disposable lighters, western-Kansas-style foot stomping and a deafening roar brought the band back for the first of three encores.

The band provided a medley of song, story, saxophone and drum solos, and on-stage antics that got the audience and even some of the roadies involved.

Their final encore featuring one of their classics, "It's Time For Me To Fly," left the audience with their ears ringing, hearts pounding and wanting more REO Speedwagon.

Investigation begins in Denver crash

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Flight recorders pulled from the twisted remains of a Continental Airlines DC-9 were flown to Washington on Monday to determine what caused the jet to crash during a snowstorm, killing 27 people and injuring 55.

The twin-engine plane was taking off at Stapleton International Airport Sunday afternoon when it flipped upside down and broke into three pieces as it slid down the runway three-quarters of a mile. At least nine survivors remained in critical condition Monday.

Hearings begin into cause of last summer's Northwest Airlines tragedy/Page 8

It could be months before the cause of the crash is determined, authorities said. As many as 50 investigators may be involved in the next seven to 10 days, said Bob Johnson, chief of the National Transportation Safety Board office in Denver. It was the deadliest crash in the 58-year history of the airport.

"There were like three separate explosions," passenger Robert Linck said. "After the first explosion, there was a ball of fire shot up through the seats in front of me, engulfing four people in front of me."

The plane's two black boxes, containing cockpit voice and data recorders, were recovered "with no evidence of external damage," said a spokesman in the NTSB office in Washington, D.C.

The cockpit voice recorder will allow investigators to review exchanges between the crew in the seconds before the accident. The second box contains a foil-faced flight data recorder which will provide various flight parameters such as air speed, heading and vertical acceleration of the DC-9 jet.

Three crew members, including the pilot and first officer, were among those killed.

The two recorders, which were housed in the tail section of the aircraft, were flown from Denver to Washington early Monday and immediately were taken to the laboratory at NTSB headquarters.

"There appears to be no evidence of any external damage," agency spokesman Michael Benson said. Preliminary information from the recorders was expected to be relayed to investigators at the crash site in Denver later Monday, he said.

Flight 1713 originated in Oklahoma City, stopped in Denver and was delayed by a snowstorm. It was en route to Boise, Idaho, when it crashed at 2:16 p.m. MST.

Snow had been falling most of the day in Denver and airport officials said visibility was low. The east-west runways were closed because of the storm, including that of Flight 1713, which was scheduled to arrive in Boise at 2:28 p.m. MST, minutes after it actually started its takeoff.

The fuselage broke into three main pieces and many of the passengers were trapped inside. The plane came to rest about 2,500 feet from the end of the 10,000-foot-long runway with bodies, injured passengers and wreckage strewn between two runways.

Airport spokesman Richard Boulware described the scene as a "jungle gym of mangled metal." There was a gaping hole in the fuselage "big enough for a one-car garage," he said.

The twin-engine DC-9 was off the ground just seconds when the accident happened, passengers said.

Dr. Norm Dinerman of Denver General Hospital, who helped coordinate crash site treatment efforts, said the fact that any passengers emerged alive was due to "tremendous luck, divine providence and the fact that the airplane had not gained a lot of altitude."

8 die when aircraft breaks apart

By The Associated Press

FORT ATKINSON, Wis. — A corporate aircraft apparently broke up in flight and crashed on a wooded ridge Monday, killing all eight people aboard, authorities said.

Witnesses and investigators said the twin-engine turboprop Beechcraft King Air 200 seemed to break apart on its way from Chicago to Baraboo, about 150 miles apart.

"What we've seen so far is indicative of an in-flight breakup," said Stephen Wilson, a National Transportation Safety Board investigator. The plane had left Meigs Field in Chicago at 7:51 a.m. and went down a half-hour later about five miles northwest of here and about 60 miles short of Baraboo, authorities said.

"The pilot was on his descent toward Baraboo when he radioed 'Mayday, mayday' several times," said Mort Edelstein, a Federal Aviation Administration spokesman in Chicago.

One engine was found a short distance from the crash. Another was found in woods nearby. Torn metal and paper littered the area. Authorities used chain saws to cut down trees where plane parts, body parts and blood-stained clothes were hanging.

The plane, which left Meigs Field in Chicago at 7:51 a.m., was en route to Baraboo when the pilot sent an emergency message shortly after 8 a.m.

Ethical issues examined Students learn lessons from history

By Erwin Seba
Collegian Reporter

One test question in the Topics in Administrative Ethics class asked students to explain why they thought Lt. Col. Oliver North was right or wrong when he lied to Congress. Examining such famous examples of ethical conflicts — like the Iran-Contra scandal — is part of the ethics class taught by William Richter, head of the Department of Political Science.

According to Richter, examining current events helps the students in the class better understand the responsibilities involved with public administration.

"We use a lot of cases," Richter said. In his class, students have watched videotapes of the Iran-Contra testimony as well as the Watergate hearings.

"Sometimes the students are put in the situation and asked 'What would you do?'" Richter said.

In one class session, students watched the testimony Rear Adm. John Poindexter, former national security adviser, gave before the Iran-Contra committees.

In his testimony, Poindexter said he did not tell President Reagan about the diversion of profits from the Iran arms sales to the Contras. Poindexter said he wanted to provide Reagan with "plausible deniability" when he didn't tell Reagan about the diversion.

Richter said Reagan bears the ultimate political responsibility for the actions of his staff members which led to the scandal.

"I don't know of any other president who has said to his staff, 'Do what you have to do, but don't let me know about it,'" Richter said.

The political system is hurt by such governmental scandals, he said.

"One of the consequences which follows is to reinforce widespread public alienation concerning government," Richter said. A scandal like Watergate can eventually cause unethical behavior by other government officials, he said.

"Also, it leads to the same sort of cynical behavior on the part of lesser public officials and non-officials,"

Richter said.

His goal for teaching the class, he said, is to enable the students to develop their own ethical standards.

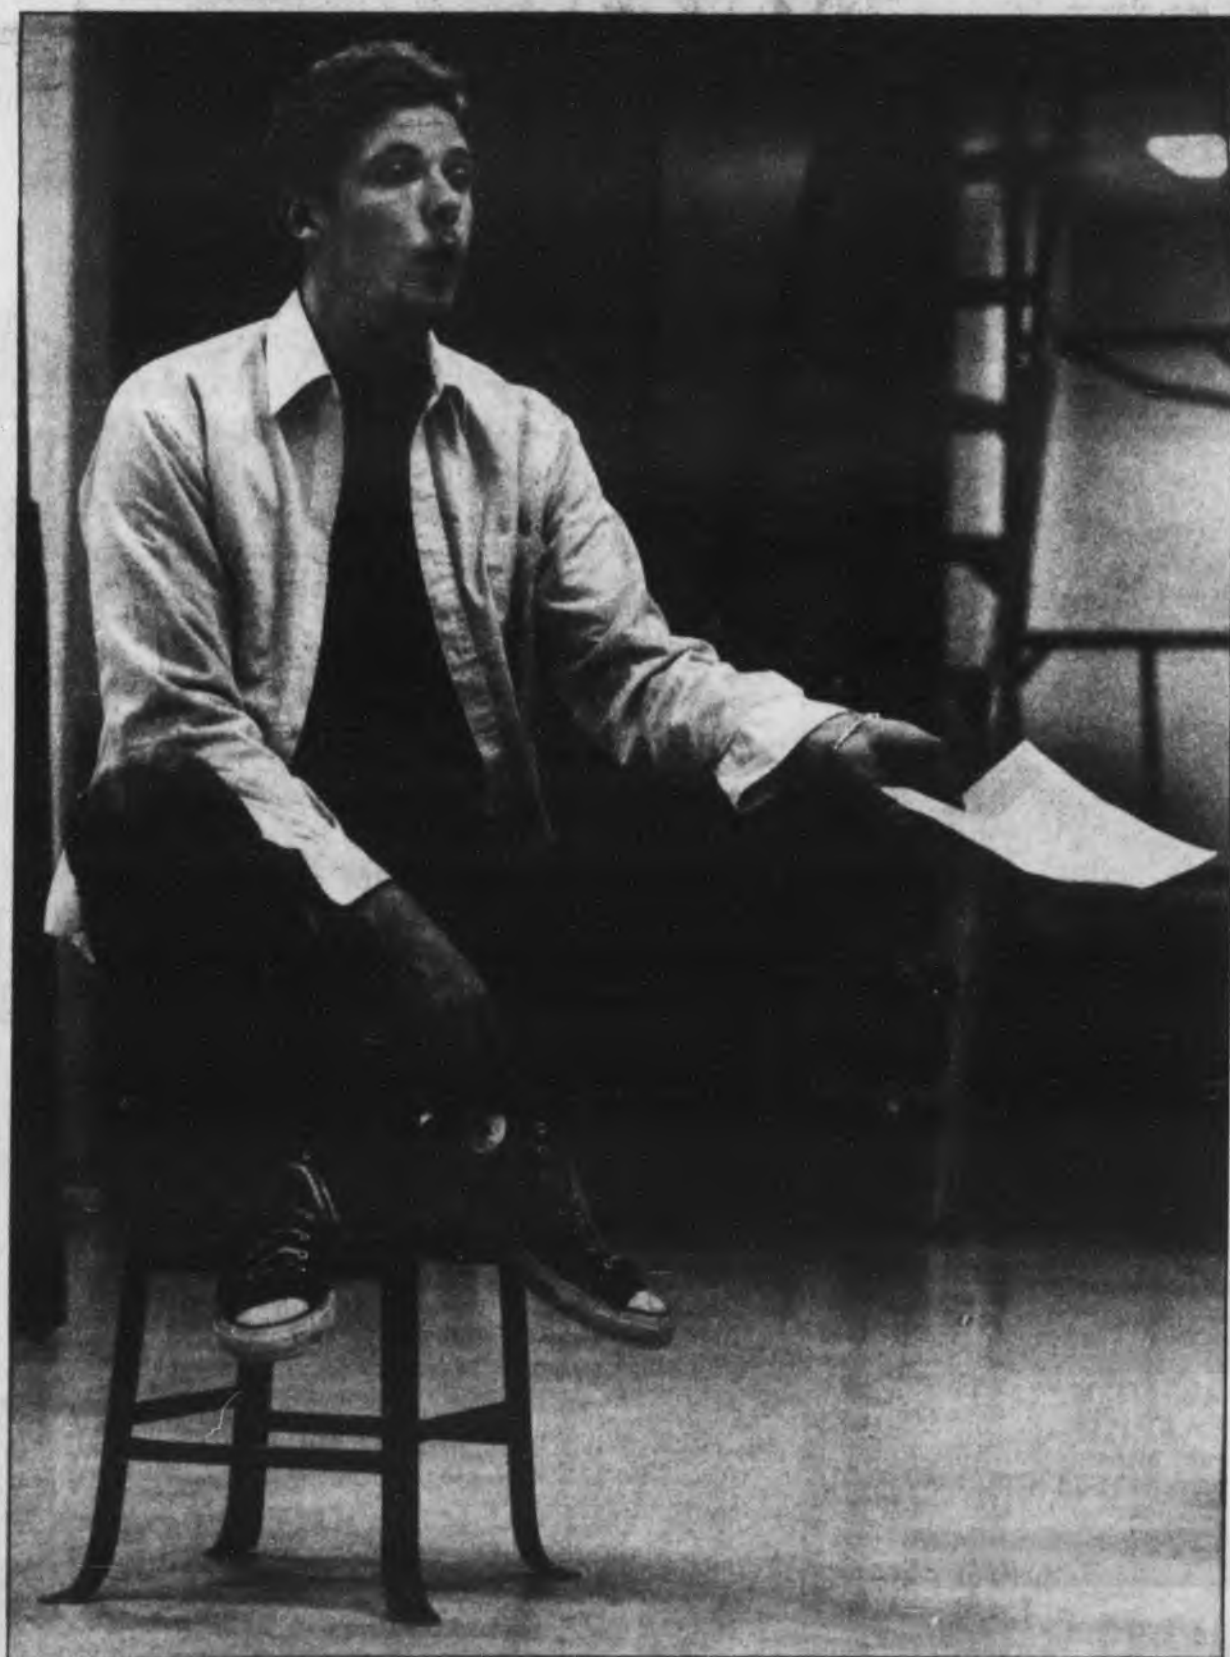

"Virtually every administrator faces dilemmas of every magnitude. Certainly, the more common dilemmas are the non-dramatic ones such as whether or not to accept a gift from a business associate," Richter said.

Richter described how he approaches the non-dramatic ethical problem when teaching his students.

"I think this class, like some others, runs the risk of crossing the boundary between education and indoctrination," he said. "I don't see it as my responsibility, or that of the course, to provide people with specific ethical stances."

Instead, Richter said he prefers to help students clarify their own ethical positions.

Noam Chomsky, fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, will also examine the ethics of the Iran-Contra scandal. He will deliver a University Convocation at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Chomsky to speak at lecture

By The Collegian Staff

Noam Chomsky, professor of linguistics and philosophy at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, will address the subject of the Iran-Contra Affair at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Chomsky will "speak of the whole unwinding of the past year dealing with the Iran-Contra affair and the role the United States played in it," said Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work.

Chomsky will also address "how the body of our laws affect what we do and how we justify it," Flora said.

Because of his wit and his ability to expose the concealed motives of U.S. policymakers, Chomsky is quickly earning a reputation as the George Orwell of contemporary American politics, she said.

More storms batter Gulf Coast leaving new damage, casualties

By The Associated Press

PALESTINE, Texas — Brutal storms with heavy rain and high wind hit the Gulf Coast from East Texas to Mississippi on Monday, causing new damage and stalling efforts to clean up the millions in wreckage left by killer tornadoes.

Storms that began Sunday had killed 11 people and injured more than 200 in Texas and Louisiana.

"Most of the time you see severe weather during the spring months, April, May and June. But there is a second peak in the fall," said Buddy McElroy of the National Weather Service's Fort Worth office.

Damage from Sunday's tornadoes was estimated in the millions of dollars, with Palestine public works director M.E. Mathis reporting damage of $5 million to $12 million in that city alone.

A tornado that struck Caldwell on Sunday "lasted about three minutes but it felt like an hour," said Diana Telschow, 28. "The back door looked like a breathing monster; it just wanted to suck us out."

At least 16 Texas counties reported damage from an estimated 20 tornadoes from Sunday into Monday, Department of Public Safety spokesman David Wells said.

"The back door looked like a breathing monster; it just wanted to suck us out."

—Diana Telschow

"There were boats flying around in the air and trees down everywhere," said Police Officer Richard Spencer of Madison, Miss., of a tornado that hit a lake.

The weather service at Galveston reported wind gusts up to 100 mph, while gusts to 80 mph were recorded at Houston's Hobby Airport.

More than 80,000 Houston Lighting & Power Co. customers were without service, mostly in an area between Houston and Galveston, said spokeswoman Geri Konigsberg.

Elsewhere in southeast Texas on Monday, wind ripped the roofs off an elementary school in Santa Fe and a store in Dickinson. About 90 miles south of San Antonio, a twister cut a mile-long swath through the western side of Beeville, said Bee County Sheriff's Deputy Ronnie Olivares.

Public schools in the Mississippi towns of Ridgeland, Madison and Flora went on tornado alerts, moving hundreds of children into halls and other protected areas, officials said.

Several rural Louisiana schools also closed and some excused students from tornado areas.

Louisiana Gov. Edwin Edwards declared a state of emergency in eight parishes Monday while crews hampered by flooded streets and highways worked to repair gas leaks and broken power lines left by Sunday's storms.

About 400 families were evacuated from houses and about 100 patients from nursing homes in Alexandria, La., where water rose up to 8 feet in some low-lying areas.

Victims need airlifts of food

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — Emergency airlifts of food are the only hope for tens of thousands of drought victims in northern Ethiopia whose relief pipeline has been disrupted by rebel attacks, the chief of U.N. relief efforts said Monday.

"We had hoped to avoid the colossal expense of an airlift, but most relief agencies agree that an immediate airlift is needed," Michael Priestley said in an interview. He is in charge of the United Nations relief program in Ethiopia.

Priestley said he hoped airlifts could begin in the next couple of weeks to Tigray province, where 75 percent of the crop has failed and 1 million people face starvation.

In neighboring Eritrea, there is a total crop loss and another 1 million people are at risk.

Budget cuts provide battlelines

WASHINGTON — White House and congressional negotiators on Monday began a final push for a deficit-reduction agreement by Friday's deadline while groups started mobilizing against any cuts in Social Security.

"We're about a week and $2 billion short, give or take," said Sen. Bob Packwood of Oregon, senior Republican on the Senate Finance Committee.

The negotiators, seeking to find the spending cuts and tax increases to satisfy the requirements of the Gramm-Rudman law, continued to discuss delaying or limiting cost-of-living increases in benefits including Social Security to close their gap.

Some lawmakers said privately those costs had to be controlled if their plan to reduce deficits by $75 billion to $80 billion over the next two years was to have credibility.

Reagan innocent, report states

WASHINGTON — Congress' report on the Iran-Contra affair concludes there was no evidence President Reagan knew of the diversion of Iran arms sale money but says he failed his duty to "see that the laws are faithfully executed," a Senate committee source said Monday.

There was sharp debate among committee members about whether to include that language in the final report, due to be released on Wednesday, said a source speaking only on condition of anonymity.

Ultimately it was left in the final document, although other criticism of Reagan was substantially toned down from earlier drafts, the source said.

The language is a paraphrase of the Constitution's description, of the president's duties. Article 2, Section 3 says "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

O'Neill to undergo surgery

BOSTON — Former House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. will undergo surgery for rectal cancer on Wednesday, and his outlook is "very favorable," his doctor said Monday.

Dr. Richard E. Wilson, chief of surgical oncology at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston, said a "polyp-like" cancer was found on the lower six inches of O'Neill's bowel.

The surgeon said tests suggest the possibility of a full recovery.

"It looks very favorable at this point," Wilson said.

Funding debated for buildings

TOPEKA — Although members acknowledged they saw a need to increase financing for maintenance at State Board of Regents institutions, the Legislature's Special Committee on Ways and Means could not come up with a way to do it Monday.

During nearly three hours of discussion, the committee rejected a proposal to increase a statewide property tax used to finance construction and maintenance of university buildings from 1 mill to 1.5 mills. It also rejected several other proposals.

As a result, the committee voted to approve a report to the 1988 Legislature that gives a history of the need for more maintenance money and concludes more money is needed — but nothing else.

Highways not a top item

WICHITA — Lt. Gov. Jack Walker said Sunday he expects the 1988 Kansas Legislature to concentrate on budgetary matters, higher education, hazardous wastes and the AIDS crisis.

Walker said at a League of Women Voters reception that he expects little action on highway issues next year until the 1989 session.

Legislators won't decide until after the November 1988 election how to pay for highway costs, particularly whether to raise gasoline taxes to pay for new construction, he said.

Walker said the special legislative session on highways last summer "was an absolute disaster for everyone concerned" although it did alert people to the highway problem. He said future efforts to pass a highway bill should focus on improving and maintaining highways rather than building new ones.

Money will continue to be the biggest headache, Walker said. "I think the governor has a problem still with the fiscal situation of the state," he said but added that the state economy is rebounding slowly.

"I really believe the economy is seeing the light at the end of the tunnel now," Walker said.

Radioactive cloth located

BURLINGTON — Two pieces of cloth containing small amounts of radioactivity were found at the Coffey County landfill Monday, officials said.

Officials of the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant, located near Burlington in Coffey County, and state authorities were scheduled to begin searching the landfill for more radioactive-contaminated material on Tuesday, said Ronn Smith, a spokesman for the plant.

The cloth found Monday contained .41 microcuries of radioactive material, which presented no danger to the public, Smith said. He said the amount of radioactivity was one-fifth the amount contained in a household smoke detector.

The materials consisted of a piece of disposable cloth about 6 inches by 12 inches and another piece about 18 inches square, Smith said.

Last week, slightly radioactive scrap duct work from the plant was found at the landfill, which is two miles east of Burlington. Officials found the cloth while they were following up on the earlier discovery, Smith said.

Officials have stopped the release of trash material from the plant's radiologically-controlled area while they investigate how the material was released from the plant, Smith said.

Delayed Again?

DOT: Unrealistic airline schedules cause delays

Lost luggage, delays and missed flights might be considered normal for some travelers and taken in stride, but the U.S. Department of Transportation has decided that it's time for some changes. Last week, DOT released September's ranking of the 14 major airlines based on their ability to meet arrival and departure schedules.

"Our hub is in the northeast corner of the United States. Delays are normal in the wintertime because of time spent deicing the plane. Safety is important and we're going to take our time and do things right. And, that's going to cause some delays."

—Nancy Vaughn

"It (the study) was a response to consumer demands and complaints," said Bill Mosley, DOT public information officer. The study considered anything more than 15 minutes behind schedule as being late.

"Their definition of on-time is 15 minutes within the scheduled time. That doesn't allow for anything out of the ordinary," said Ray Freeby, station manager for Eastern Air MidWest Express. Eastern is located at the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

USAir was ranked the lowest in the study, with only 67.4 percent of their flights landing "on-time." American Airlines was ranked the highest with 84.5 percent of their flights landing as scheduled.

Nancy Vaughn, USAir manager of public relations, said the company realizes its September performance was unacceptable.

Karen Crane and her three-year-old daughter Megan, of Chicago, wait for their luggage at Kansas City International Airport.

The percentage of on-time departures and arrivals of some airlines serving KCI.

USAir 67.4	✈
Northwest Airlines 69	✈
Delta Air Lines 72.3	✈
Trans World Airlines 78.4	✈
United Airlines 79.2	✈
Eastern Airlines 80.4	✈
Continental Airlines 81.1	✈
Southwest Airlines 82.4	✈
American Airlines 84.5	✈

Nearly one of every four flights of large airlines arrived at least 15 minutes late in September, according to DOT's study. Figures for Braniff, Midway and commuter flights at Kansas City Industrial Airport were not included because they are not considered major carriers.

Staff/Mary Ward

"Since that time, we have taken measures that have resulted in our figures for October increasing to 77.3 percent. That's a difference of 10 percent," Vaughn said.

The percentage is something that Mosley believes consumers will use.

"This is something for consumers to use in planning trips. In the long run, it should reduce flight delays," he said.

Freeby isn't sure that it's a good number for them to use, though.

"It's not a clean statistic. It doesn't necessarily reflect the reality of the situation," he said. "It's almost like the government didn't have enough to do."

The statistic, Freeby said, fails to account for delays due to the airport where the flight is landing, weather or mechanical problems.

Weather played a big role in USAir's September ranking, Vaughn said.

"Our hub is in the northeast corner of the United States. Delays are normal in the wintertime because of time spent deicing the plane," she said. "Safety is important and we're going to take our time and do things right. And, that's going to cause some delays."

Freeby said DOT's decision not to include mechanical delays was the best they made.

"If they had decided to count mechanical delays, one of two things would have happened. They (airlines) would have deferred making the repairs or would not have reported them correctly," he said.

Mosley said that congestion and general overcrowding are the main causes of flight delays.

"Although weather may be part of the problem, the main one is unrealistic scheduling by the airlines," Mosley said.

Since USAir's bottom ranking in September, the airline has increased ground time between flights, ultimately lowering the number of flights per aircraft.

"We are not really reducing the number of flights since we add two planes each month," Vaughn said.

DOT's monthly ranking is based on information provided by the companies.

"It would be different if it was voluntary — but it's not," he said.

In the late 1970s, airlines were tightly regulated, Freeby said. They were deregulated in 1977.

"It's like the government wants to put its foot back in the door and regain some of its control over airlines," Freeby said.

However, changes aren't stopping at the new public ranking. Congress is considering a bill which will set up a toll-free phone number for passengers to call if they lose their luggage.

"If you take a flight from New York City to San Francisco, change planes in Denver and your luggage is lost, the last carrier is responsible. They might not have lost it, but they're responsible," Freeby said.

This proposal is important, Freeby said, although it may not seem like much to most.

"They (the changes) really aren't needed. They (passengers) probably will look at these numbers with indifference after about six months," he said.

Airlines will have to be more responsible due to the changes, said William Fogerson, general manager of the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

"Any time you add regulations, it's going to be passed on to the general public. That's the bad thing about it," Fogerson said.

"Competition and free enterprise being what it is in this nation, the consumer would see that these changes were made on their own. And, that's indirectly what they're doing," he said.

Freeby said that the emphasis on service or price depends on the customer.

"Passengers can be divided into two categories — business and non-business. People flying for business are concerned with on-time performance. Non-business flyers, 90 percent of the time, are influenced by price," Freeby said.

Cari Graves, assistant manager of Creative Travel Inc., agreed the first concern of regular fliers is scheduling. However, an airline's ability to arrive and depart on time is of growing importance to passengers, she said.

"Passengers have been really becoming more aware of the problem in the past six months," Graves said.

In addition to chronically late airlines, there are also chronically late airports, Graves said.

Mosley said DOT is aware of airports which run late, and is investigating them. He included Denver's Stapleton International Airport, San Francisco International Airport, New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport and La Guardia Airport.

Other airports Graves and Freeby listed as being chronically busy and late included International Airport, O'Hara Airport in Chicago, Hartsfield Atlanta International Airport and Washington National Airport in Washington, D.C.

"Especially in the winter, the East Coast is bad," Freeby said.

Although Manhattan's airport may be physically smaller, Freeby said his station is the sixth busiest compared to the company's other locations.

"It may be small physically, but there is a lot of activity out here," he said. The airport handles the second most air traffic in Kansas.

Nancy Carter, American Airlines employee, helps a passenger over the phone. American Airlines had the best on-time percentage of flights according to the U.S. Department of Transportation's survey.

Choosing necessities normal for poor Rich nation, too much poverty

How would you like to have to choose between paying the rent, having your house lights on, keeping warm in the winter (or cool in the summer), paying the doctor bills, or having food to eat? For most of us, considering a choice from the above options is purely theoretical, but for others less fortunate, chronic poverty is a very serious reality. Since 1979, the number of people living below the poverty level — making less than $10,989 a year for a family of four — has increased by 7 million, according to a 1985 U.S. Census Bureau Report. The Food Research and Action Center (FRAC) issued a report in March of this year divulging the startling information that 33 million Americans are now chronically poor. And the situation is getting worse.

Doesn't it seem odd that the wealthiest of developed nations has such a great number of poor citizens? Even sadder is the fact that we produce more than enough food to feed the entire country. It can be argued that poverty in the United States cannot even be compared to that of many of our impoverished developing neighbors, but that is the catch. We are not a struggling Third World nation — the United States is one of the richest and most powerful countries in the world. Yet poverty still exists among us.

Since the election of Ronald Reagan, the federal government has been ingenious in extricating itself from sponsoring social programs, creating what could be called a new underclass in our society: the homeless. While all fault cannot be attributed to Reagan and his apparent disdain for the poor, a survey conducted by the National Coalition for the Homeless concluded that federal intervention could end the crisis of homelessness. The Coalition also reported that 2 to 3 million Americans today are homeless, more than at any time since the Great Depression.

Perhaps the greatest obstacle in combating poverty and homelessness is the misconception shared by millions of Americans that, if the economy gets better, so will the lives of the poor. This isn't necessarily so.

Over the past 10 years or so, while corporations and the wealthy have become increasingly richer, the poor have gotten poorer and poorer. And serving to only aggravate the situation is a very unfortunate element of Reagan's platform known as privatization. What this plan calls for, basically, are cutbacks in federal incentive programs for private investment in low-income housing. It leaves the construction of housing for those less fortunate entirely up to the private sector. What's wrong with that? Nothing, other than the fact that developers, if not given incentives, will refrain from the construction of public housing, since it offers them few profits. According to the U.S. Conference of Mayors, Housing Development Action Grants (HoDAGs) and Urban Development Action Grants (UDAGs) have been cut by at least 50 percent, and many similar programs have been eliminated entirely. One need only examine the aforementioned statistics on the numbers of poor and homeless today, to determine the success of privatization.

Collegian Columnist

Consider some other facts issued by FRAC:

■ Between 1971 and 1981, the country's infant mortality rate dropped by an average of 5 percent a year. Between 1981 and 1983, it slowed down to the present rate of 3 percent a year.

■ The United States ranks 17th in the world in preventing infant deaths, down from 16th in 1980.

■ In February 1987, 7.9 million Americans were unemployed.

■ In 1986, only 32.9 percent of the unemployed workers received unemployment insurance compared to 76 percent in 1975. About 5.5 million people were without unemployment assistance in an average month in 1986.

■ Nearly 4 million more Americans lived in poverty in 1985 than in 1980, and 2.5 million fewer students received a school lunch in 1986 than in 1980.

All of the above are causes or consequences of poverty, or contribute negatively to the condition of the poor in America today. Why isn't more done to help these people? It would be erroneous to make a generalization stating that the majority of Americans are apathetic to poverty in this country. Lack of awareness does play an important part, especially in a state like Kansas, where, although poverty exists, it isn't always as noticeable as in larger urban centers. However, people, when informed, do tend to contribute to church or other local organizations involved in social work. The problem is that contributions from the private sector alone do not solve the problem in its entirety. Organization on a larger scale is necessary.

Today, Nov. 17, is a national day for awareness of poverty in America, aptly titled "Justice for All." This day is part of a campaign to educate the American people about the real scope of poverty in America and to rekindle a public commitment to eliminating it. "Justice for All" is first and foremost an educational campaign, aiming to dispel the stereotypes associated with the poor and pointing out how poverty affects us all, even if indirectly so. The campaign also stresses the idea that poverty can be abolished, but only through a concentrated effort of our entire society. The generosity of private individuals is always welcome, but to end the problem, increased governmental intervention is needed.

There will be a teach-in at the Union courtyard between 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. today, aiming to educate this campus about some facts on poverty in our nation. Various members of K-State faculty will speak about rural poverty, mortality rate among the poor, the feminization of poverty and "turning baby food into bombs."

Public awareness is definitely necessary to try to bring about the end of poverty in America.

Answers imperative in airplane tragedies

Following a relatively safe period for air travel, two domestic aviation tragedies in the past two days have claimed 34 lives. On Sunday, a DC-9 crashed on takeoff from Denver's Stapleton International Airport, killing 26.

On Monday, a commuter plane flying from Chicago to a Wisconsin destination went down, killing all eight aboard. Meanwhile, investigation into the cause of last summer's Northwest Airlines crash which claimed 156 lives is just beginning.

Right now is a critical time for the aviation industry because of the answers it must produce. Nearly as many questions remain over last summer's disaster as over Sunday's crash.

Although hindsight is always sharper than foresight, doubt must be placed on the decision to allow the Denver jet to take off in what amounted to a blinding snowstorm.

Visibility was low, and snow and strong crosswinds significantly complicated air travel.

However, for whatever reason, Flight 1713 was given the go-ahead to take off, and the tragic result is now history.

The immediate concern now, as in any air disaster, is to find out why. The long-range concern — also, as in any air disaster — is to learn from whatever mistake caused this crash.

Any accident that results in the loss of human life is an indictment of the reliability of the system, and each incident must be treated as such. It's certainly no secret that concern has been expressed over the reliability of the nation's air network, and now is the time to deliver concrete answers and solid, workable solutions.

Officials investigating the Denver tragedy should consider their work of the utmost importance.

Lack of funding shows need for pay increase

If there was any doubt as to the effect a lack of funding has on an educational institution, the recent study ranking K-State salaries as last in the Big Eight Conference and 49th out of 50 in the nation should dispel it.

According to officials here, the salary levels for faculty at the University essentially kept up with increases in income during the 1970s but began to lag behind along with the rate of inflation. Even though salary levels now run "parallel" with income increases, this does not mean they are equal to those incomes.

When incomes go up, so do salaries here by the same percentage, but not the same amount of money.

These figures ought to jar some action out of lawmakers in Topeka. If Gov. Mike Hayden and the legislators do not make any progress toward providing more funding to higher education, through the "Margin of Excellence" program or any other plan, then it would be time to seriously question their resolve for educating the people of Kansas.

No studies have come out showing that Kansas roads nor opportunities for economic development are ranked near the worst in the nation. It is time these decision-makers realized where the real need for funding is in this state.

If K-State is so poorly funded, then all the rest of the educational institutions cannot be much better off.

This study shows the need for better salaries. For those responsible for correcting this situation, now is the time to act.

Teach children for future peace

Terrorist bombings occur with such regularity throughout the world these days that we hardly give the stories more than a fleeting glance as we read the morning paper. Last week there were two in Lebanon and one in Sri Lanka, but the one in Northern Ireland got my undivided attention. It occurred in the town of Enniskillen, where 320 years ago, the first Annis left to emigrate to America.

This bomb, which killed 11 civilians and wounded 63, brought out the realization of a campaign of terrorism which has killed 2,611 people since 1969 and shows no signs of letting up. It also brought home the fact that, unlike other terrorist activities involving ethnic groups and religious beliefs, we have difficulty relating to this nasty little civil war which involves a people who supplied the native stock for millions of Americans.

Why is it that the U.S. government, which sees itself as the policeman or peacemaker of virtually every conflict on this globe, has not put its nose into this affair? For one thing, it involves our oldest and most dependable ally — England. But more importantly, we would have trouble taking sides as we usually do — identifying one as good, the other as evil. There is "good" and "evil" on both sides and plenty of politicians in this country with constituencies of Irish-Americans of either group.

The cast of characters includes the mainly Catholic Irish Republic Army (IRA), now banned, which wants to unify Northern Ireland with the predominantly Catholic Republic of Ireland. In Northern Ireland, Protestants outnumber Catholics three to two. The IRA's political wing, Sean Fein, which can legally participate in the political scene, insisted the bombing should be seen in the context of the movement's fight for Irish independence.

The Protestants are led by Ian Paisly, who plainly hinted that Protestant paramilitary groups of the Ulster Defense League (UDL) should avenge the bombing, saying: "We must seriously consider taking the law into our own hands." So, if past experience is any indicator, we will now see a series of senseless assassinations of individual Catholics in Northern Ireland to "even the score."

The third element in this witches brew is the English army, which in the name of peacekeeping violates most precepts of human rights in interrogating and imprisoning suspected IRA members. Although the IRA claims that the army and the police are the target of their bombs and bullets, the undeniable fact exists that 1,800 of the 2,611 people who have died are civilians. This year alone, 86 people have been killed on both sides.

Although the U.S. government has taken a hands-off policy, Americans of Irish ancestry are constantly being solicited and are contributing money to both sides. It's time that Irish-Americans became even more active in demanding that we quit giving material support to either side, write off the present generation, and do whatever we can to change the mindset of the youth of Ireland.

If the country's political parties and religious leaders involved cannot effectively address the issue, at least we as individuals can. One person who is doing just that is Mrs. Samuel Gale of Minneapolis. Each year, Gale pays the transportation from Northern Ireland for scores of children between 10 and 12 to spend a summer with a Minnesota family, far from the war zone they call home. This sojourn from the 24-hour terror under which they have grown up is spent with private families throughout the state who have volunteered their homes and their time. Typically, the family has children of the same age group.

Perhaps a global sponsorship program is a feasible route. You can call it an exchange program if you like, but the purpose is the same — to let children of all nationalities and religions mingle with each other. They don't have to love one another, they just learn to understand and tolerate another's culture and way of life. Imagine what U.S.-Soviet relations might be like in another generation if every American youth could spend time with a Russian family and vice versa.

I know we've heard it before, but the future peace of the world depends on how our children are brought up in it. Lasting peace is rarely achieved through purely political means. The best efforts of the late Anwar Sadat, Oscar Arias Sanchez, Jesse Jackson and Terry Waite only provide temporary solutions or an opportunity for rational thought. It is the children who hold the key to lasting peace. Without their open mind and open hearts, there is no hope for the future, and peace will be locked out forever.

Letters

Humor disputed

Editor,

In my three years at Kansas State I have always enjoyed the editorial page. But lately something has distressed me. I have become curious to know whether Jeff Schrag (alias Peedwatt Shagnasty) will ever write a serious column. Jeff, I don't mind some occasional humor, but your overzealous, short-fallen attempts at it have pushed me over the edge. Every time I turn to Page 4 and see your mug, I read another one of your stupid columns.

I have never seen such a waste of space as was your column in the Nov. 6 edition of the Collegian. Nobody wants to know your problems, and I do not care to read any more of your bogus letters.

Do yourself a favor, Jeff—face up to life. I am sure there are hundreds of topics you could write on that would provide some insight for us editorial readers. Quit hiding behind your so-called humor and give us an honest opinion. Either shape up or print your articles in place of "Rubes" on the back page, where "humor" is welcomed with open arms.

Smokers lose

Editor,

Most state employees will be surprised to learn that the $10 per month smoking penalty in the upcoming health care program will not go to Blue Cross and Blue Shield. It will go to a state agency "wellness" program.

Spokespersons at the office of the Health Care Commission and the office of the Commissioner of Insurance both admitted that there is no enforcement provision involved. One said that a list of names of smoker-cheaters might be published; the other said that informers, through some undefined procedure, might cause cheaters to have to pay the $10 monthly assessment back to the beginning of the insurance year.

One spokesperson said that a legal opinion had been obtained to the effect that the $10 monthly smoking assessment was legal—at least until the issue is decided in court. When asked whether eating red meat (a cholesterol hazard that wouldn't sell well in Kansas) might be added, the answer was that other health penalties might be considered in future years. Possible inclusion of aberrant sexual preferences, due to the very real hazard of AIDS, was firmly ruled out on the grounds of infringement of civil rights.

Parking problem

Editor,

The recent action of those in charge of issuing reserved parking stalls is a move in the wrong direction. They made reserved parking stalls available for no reason except dollars. I was on the traffic and parking committee for three years. We recommended to President Duane Acker that all prestige-based reserved stalls be eliminated except for a very few officials who often needed to move their cars on truly important K-State business. He rejected our recommendation, saying we wanted it to go into effect too soon. A more appropriate time never came.

As one comes to this campus each morning, or walks around it during the day, one sees many unoccupied reserved stalls. I think unnecessary reserves are a waste of scarce space as well as encouraging their holders to spend less time on their jobs. It would be interesting to have the campus patrol survey those stalls from 8-9 a.m., from 11 a.m.-noon, from 1-2 p.m. and from 4-5 p.m., which is half of the working day. Possession of a reserved stall is a great temptation to be late to work, early to leave and to take various trips for business, pleasure or family matters during the day. Some will say they can work better at home some days. When I was engaged in war research at Columbia University during the 1940s, we academics were excused from necessarily being on or near our offices most of the day so we could have "thinking time" elsewhere. Many a thoughtful hour was spent in downtown Manhattan shopping; or whatever. That is just human nature; and K-State people are also humans.

Why aggravate an already critical situation by issuing an unnecessarily large number of reserved stalls, especially those based solely on prestige or solely on dollars?

It also would help if those who are healthy and physically able, and live only a few blocks from the campus, would leave their cars at home and walk. That could even be a real part of a physical fitness program.

In case someone should ask: Why does a retired person come to the campus and aggravate the situation? My wife and I live seven miles from the campus and she is not retired. I also have an office on campus. When I lived on Legore Lane, I walked to my office in Calvin Hall.

Music minded

Editor,

I'm sorry I have to be so direct, but I consider Dan Owens' commentary "Rock Music Appeals to Economists Also," as mindless trash! How dare you mention Journey in the same breath as AC/DC (whose music I, too, consider mindless trash)!

Journey features one of the premier singers in the rock world today in Steve Perry. Perry sang in the USA for Africa project and virtually lifted Journey from unknowns to superstardom. With his powerful, yet soothing voice, he sets Journey at a level above many other groups.

Also featured with Steve Perry is the guitarist Neal Schon. Schon is one of rock's best guitarists whom I consider on the same level as Eddie Van Halen. Schon has been playing in the "big time" since he was 15 when he performed with the group Santana! He is held in high regard by many of rock's guitarists like Eddie Van Halen.

Journey has many beautiful ballads which I and many others consider very meaningful. To consider songs like "Open Arms," "Faithfully" and "Happy to Give" as "mindless trash" is ridiculous! Chill out, Dan! Have you ever heard Journey's latest album? I'm not saying that I don't like Sting. In fact, I have his album "The Dream of the Blue Turtles" and I like it a lot. However, not all music has to be political to be important or meaningful!

Thanks for effort

Editor,

First of all, I would like to thank Jack Taylor for all the hard work, time and effort that he put into his campaign. Even though Jack did not get elected, he is the true epitome of a winner and a champion.

To all the people that supported me throughout this campaign, a great deal of gratitude is given. And to all of the students of K-State, thank you.

School district teaches effects of AIDS

By Linda Huddelston
Collegian Reporter

In light of increasing concern about the AIDS epidemic, one of the Manhattan-Ogden school district's main concerns is to help students make decisions about values and sexuality.

Tom Hawk, director of secondary education and staff development for USD 383, said the schools try to give students the information necessary to help them make the decisions that face them as teen-agers and young adults.

"In our nine-week health course, we try to make students aware of their sexuality and help them improve their decision-making skills," Hawk said. "We don't tell them what's right or wrong; we just try to give them the facts about sex, drugs, alcohol and other teen-age problems."

Although Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome is dangerous, it's critical to educate students and not make them paranoid about getting the disease, Hawk said.

"AIDS is a serious disease with very severe consequences," he said. "It's important that the kids have the facts, but it's also important not to scare them away from being intimate and realizing their own sexuality."

In the Manhattan-Ogden school district, the AIDS education program has been in effect for about four years. An introductory session is given in grades seven and eight and is continued in the ninth grade health class at Manhattan High School. At the beginning of the 1987-88 school year, MHS sent out AIDS information pamphlets to the families in the school district.

Valerie Overdahl, health instructor at MHS, said ignorance about AIDS is what has caused both local and national panic over the disease.

"People need to be educated about AIDS and other serious health concerns," Overdahl said. "It's the lack of education that causes the paranoia. That's why we start our AIDS session with a knowledge base about the facts and myths of the disease."

Overdahl said most students seem interested in learning about AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases.

"Most of the students understand the facts about AIDS, and it helps them to analyze their own relationships and sexuality," she said.

Both Hawk and Overdahl agree that AIDS education is important, but having knowledge of the disease does not always change sexual behavior.

"Education and knowing doesn't lead to behavior consonance," Hawk said. "Having the facts doesn't ensure the appropriate behavior. We just hope that by giving them the information, and by relying on their parents, kids will make logical sexual decisions."

Overdahl said many students don't consider AIDS a personal threat.

"A lot of students have the 'it won't happen to me' attitude," she said. "We try to teach them that what they do will have a direct effect on what happens to them."

Overdahl thinks the new legislation enacted by the Kansas Board of Education that makes AIDS education mandatory in Kansas schools by September 1988 will benefit both students and their families.

"This program will help our school system provide time and funds for AIDS education," Overdahl said. "We currently have sufficient time to give the students a base of information, but we could use a lot more time to help them with decisions about sex."

The decision-making skills the students develop and enhance are the key focus of the school's health program, Hawk said.

"Our job is to engage and motivate students to think about things important to them in the future and things that are important to them today," Hawk said. "We want to help them convey strong attitudes and values without destroying their self-concepts."

Hawk said most parents want to control how soon and whether their children get involved in sexual relationships.

"As a parent myself, I'm concerned that my kids know the facts about sex and human sexuality," he said.

"I would love it if every family taught its kids sexuality, decision-making and values. However, we know that some families don't."

"So we try to teach some of these things in school."

He also said the school's mission is to give information to students so they understand sexuality, and that intimacy doesn't always mean intercourse.

"I'm not advocating sex, I'm advocating sexuality, which is a part of all of us," Hawk said.

"Awareness of self and knowing about sex roles in society makes students and parents more sensitive to equality issues."

"And educating the students about teen problems and issues is where we start."

Shooting spree put in past

Residents continue on after deaths

By The Associated Press

MARSHFIELD, Mo. — Residents of the rural southern Missouri town of Elkland say they are coming to grips with the deaths of seven neighbors in a September shooting spree.

Jim Schnick, a dairy farmer and volunteer firefighter, is to enter a plea in court here today in the fatal shootings of his wife, her brother and his family. Officials say he tried to divert blame to one of the victims, his 14-year-old nephew, Kirk Buckner.

Highway Patrol Sgt. Tom Martin said he has spent a lot of time in Elkland investigating the deaths and sees townspeople putting the tragedy behind them.

"They seem to be going on with their lives," he said in a telephone interview. "Everything's back to normal pretty much."

"I haven't heard much talk about it. I believe everyone is feeling better," said Judy Carr.

Carr's 16-year-old son, Brad, attended school with Kirk, a slight, dark-haired youth whom neighbors described as hard-working and quiet, part of a close-knit but financially struggling family.

Kirk died before dawn on Sept. 25, along with his parents, three younger brothers and aunt, in shootings on the Schnick and Buckner farms five miles apart. Schnick said he killed the boy during a struggle after Kirk killed Schnick's wife.

Webster County Sheriff Eugene Fraker said authorities at first were "as sure as they could be" that Kirk was the attacker. Kirk was buried under that shadow, but authorities say their suspicions quickly focused on Schnick.

Kirk was left-handed, while the gun used in the killings was found in his right hand. At just 90 pounds, he was too small to have dumped the body of his 250-pound father along the road where it was found, or to have wrestled with his uncle. And neighbors just didn't buy it.

"It was just impossible for him to do it. He just wasn't that kind of a child," Carr said.

Schnick was charged Oct. 5 with first-degree murder in the deaths of his wife Julie, 30; her brother, Steve Buckner, 35; Buckner's wife, Jeanette, 36, and the Buckner's four children: Kirk, Dennis, 8, Timmy, 6, and Michael, 2. Jim and Julie Schnick had two children, who were not injured.

Officials say Schnick, 36, admitted during a two-hour interrogation before he was formally charged that he was responsible for the shootings. Schnick's statement was videotaped, authorities said.

Carr said it is no easier to believe that Schnick was responsible for the shootings. Schnick is described as a congenial, helpful neighbor. He was a member of the Elkland Volunteer Fire Department and was running a raffle to help buy new equipment. "This is still a terrific tragedy," said Audie DeHart, principal of Marshfield Junior High School, which Kirk attended before going to high school this fall.

"This is a small community and I like to think a caring community. We feel sorry for the survivors and all they have to go through. We still have seven people dead."

Carr said Schnick's trial in Marshfield, the county seat, will be attended by many residents of nearby Elkland, a town of about 200 people located 15 miles northeast of Springfield.

Schnick, who is being held without bail in the county jail, will plead innocent to the charges, said his attorney, James McNabb.

First-degree murder is punishable by death or life imprisonment without possibility of parole. County prosecutor Donald Cheever has said he would consider asking for the death penalty.

Cheever has said he is confident of a motive but refused to discuss it.

When Kirk was suspected in the killings, residents focused on his family's financial problems, wondering if he had been driven to the crime by despair and frustration. The Buckner home was dilapidated. One neighbor, Jim Murphy, said that after working long hours on the farm, Kirk would look for odd jobs.

Economics continues to play a role as officials try to determine a motive for the killings. Martin said investigators examined wills, insurance policies and the financial status of the two families.

The Schnick farm is well-kept, but neighbors say the Schnicks also were troubled by debt.

According to published reports, Schnick held a substantial life insurance policy on his wife and had co-signed a bank note that would have given him debt-free title to the Buckner farm if his brother-in-law died.

Recalled rabies vaccine of little concern locally

Laboratory to pay for revaccination

By Michelle Engemann
Collegian Reporter

Although veterinarians in Manhattan are contacting their clients, they aren't overly concerned about the callback for a rabies vaccine.

The vaccine, made by Norden Laboratories in Lincoln, Neb., was labeled as being effective for three years when administered subcutaneously under a dog's skin. Its effectiveness was later found to last only two years, said Richard Lewis, veterinarian at Eastside Veterinary Clinic.

"They changed the label to say it could be given subcutaneously instead of intramuscularly. They didn't change the product one iota," Lewis said.

Lewis said he had used the intramuscular method anyway, so he wasn't calling back any dogs. He is informing concerned callers of the situation, though.

Gerald Bond, veterinarian at Westside Veterinary Clinic, said he switched to another vaccine after finding out about the mislabeling.

After hearing rumors that the vaccine is ineffective, Bond called Norden Laboratories. They told him the labeling for under-the-skin administration had not yet passed federal inspection, but the company and federal inspectors saw no reason why it would not pass. Norden was allowed to change the labels before complete testing was done on the vaccine.

Bond said he was not recalling any dogs who had received the vaccine. However, he is notifying his clients of the need for booster shots after the two-year period.

William Fortney, assistant professor of surgery and medicine, said the small animal hospital at the K-State Veterinary Center vaccinated about 500 dogs subcutaneously with the Norden vaccine. Clients were notified by letter of the problem. Most of the clients have brought their dogs in for revaccination, he said.

Fortney said the small animal hospital will take advantage of a reimbursement program offered by Norden Laboratories for veterinarians who call back dogs for revaccination.

"We know who isn't going to pay for it — the owner," Fortney said.

Fortney said the advantage of the subcutaneous administration is a good idea because it causes less discomfort to the animal.

Owners who had their dog vaccinated with the Norden vaccine should have their pet revaccinated just to be sure.

"There's no harm in revaccinating. It's a little bit of a nuisance that got played up too much. The vaccine (Norden) won't hurt the animal in any way and any other vaccine won't hurt either," Fortney said.

Syracuse No. 1, 'Cats get votes in first AP poll

By Staff and Wire Reports

Fresh off an 88-51 drubbing of the Spirit Express Saturday in Ahearn Field House, K-State received seven votes and was ranked 38th in the Associated Press' preseason college men's basketball poll released Monday.

Four teams on the Wildcats' schedule this season made the Top 20. Purdue, which K-State will play Dec. 20 at West Lafayette, Ind., ranks second and received six, first place votes.

Other Big Eight Conference teams in the ranking include Kansas, entering the season at No. 7; Missouri is at No. 8 and Oklahoma ranks 19th. The 'Cats will play these teams at least twice this season.

Also appearing twice on K-State's slate this season is Southern Mississippi, which received 13 votes and is 34th on the poll.

"Our non-conference schedule is very challenging and, as always, we have to contend with an ever-increasingly rugged Big Eight schedule," K-State Coach Lon Kruger said.

"It doesn't just happen," he added. "We've got to go out, and execute better and do things better to improve on last season and that's not going to be real easy to do."

Last season, the 'Cats finished 20-11 overall, 8-6 in the Big Eight and ranked as high as 24th in the AP poll.

Syracuse, runner-up last season to national champion Indiana, has been chosen the No. 1 team in the AP's poll, but Coach Jim Boheim said the Orangemen must prove their worth on the court.

"It's a nice honor, but it's more a reflection of how we did last year than what we'll do this year, and the fact that we've got three key guys coming back," Boheim said.

"Polls are interesting for the fans. I don't know that they mean anything to coaches and players," he said. "There are so many good teams, it's just so difficult to predict who's going to be No. 1."

Boheim's feeling about the balance among quality teams in college basketball this season was reflected in the poll, in which the first nine teams received first place votes.

Still, the Orangemen, who finished 31-7 last season and lost to the Hoosiers 74-73 in the NCAA title game, were the overwhelming choice for No. 1, receiving 32 of 64 first place votes and 1,177 points from a nationwide panel of writers and broadcasters. It was the first-ever No. 1 ranking in the AP poll for Syracuse.

Purdue, one of three Big 10 Conference teams in the Top Ten, edged North Carolina by one point, 975-974, for second.

Purdue, which tied with Indiana for the conference title last season, has four starters back.

K-State rides dusty trail to rodeo

By Janelle Poole
Collegian Reporter

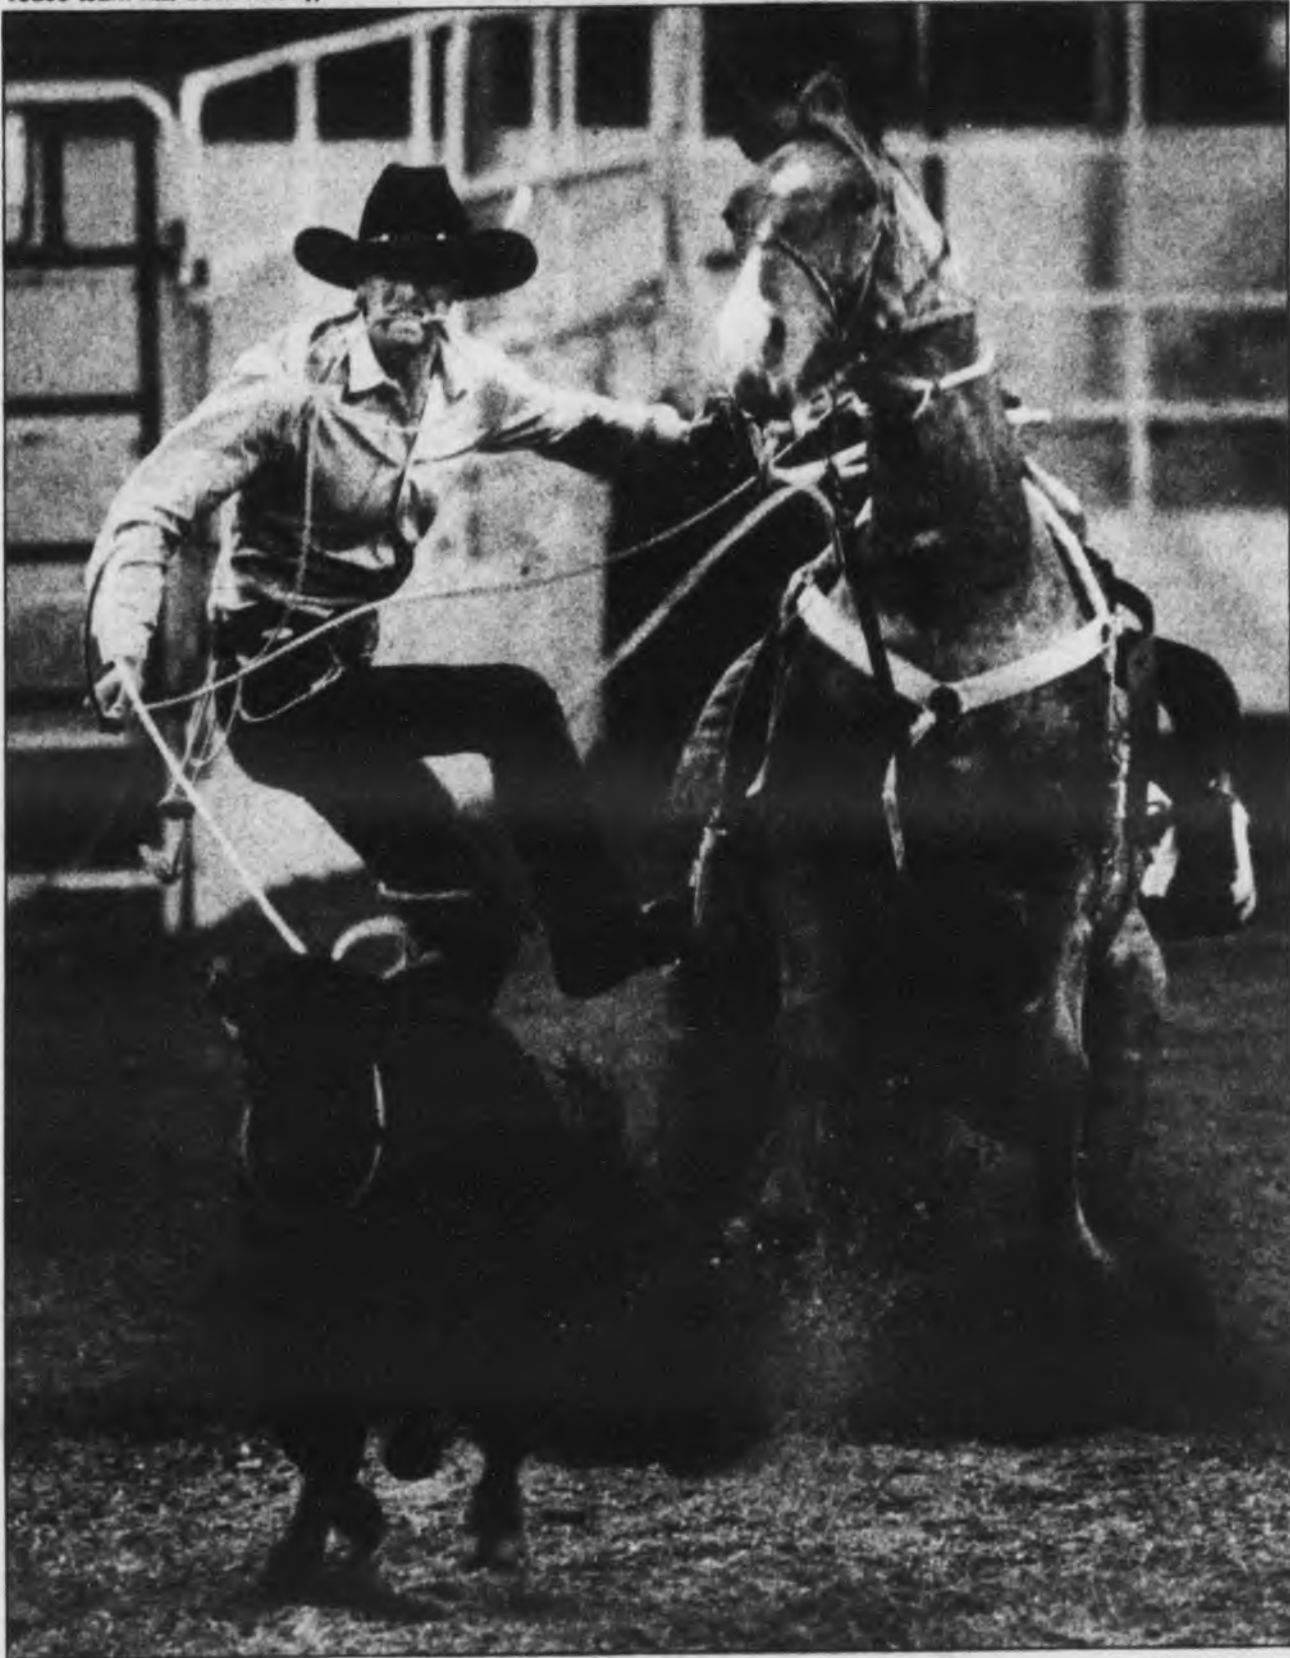

They say in rodeo you have to make dust or you eat dust. K-State's rodeo team has been hitting the trail trying to make dust.

The college rodeo season is in full swing with K-State competing in the Central Plains circuit of the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association, which includes Kansas and Oklahoma.

While the team has been competing heavily within the college circuit, some members are also hitting the road in the professional ranks. These members compete not only in the

A cowboy jumps from his horse in the calf roping competition at the American Royal Rodeo Friday in Kansas City's Kemper Arena. Several K-State students and alumni competed in the American Royal Rodeo.

NIRA, but also in the Professional Cowboys Rodeo Association. K-State bull rider Mark Bohr traveled to the American Royal Rodeo in Kansas City where his high score of 76 earned him a ninth place standing but no financial reward, as PRCA paid only to the top eight placings. Team member Mike Vohs also competed but did not complete his ride and received no score.

Ray Wessel, K-State alumni and previous winner of the American Royal Rodeo in bull riding, also competed but did not complete his ride and received no score.

Wessel, though, went the distance in bull riding to bring home the championship at the recent Prairie Circuit Finals in Guthrie, Okla. In three rounds of competition, Wessel placed first in two and second in one to win the average and the circuit finals title.

The team recently returned from Northwestern Oklahoma State University at Alva, Okla., with four members placing in four events.

Overall, Fort Scott Community College won the men's team title with Panhandle State University finishing second. The women's team title was garnered by Southwestern Oklahoma University.

In college rodeo competition — which consists of one round of competition and a top-10 round — every member enters in the first, "long go-around." The top 10 placings then advance to the "short go."

Sherri Vanderford, who was the only girls' team member to place, won the long go-around in girls' breakaway roping with a time of 2.6 seconds, a safe distance ahead of the 3.0 second place finish. Vanderford advanced to the short go but received no time, as she failed to rope the calf.

Ryan Kile and Lee Barr teamed up to place in the first go-around, fourth in the second go-around and fourth in the average in team roping. After only two rodeos, Barr is splitting seventh place in team roping.

In the roughstock events, two members placed for K-State. In saddle bronc riding, Sam Kiefer placed fifth in the first go-around. Vohs split ninth place in the first round of bull riding, but in advancing to the second round, did not place.

Travis says he'll stick with K-State

By Tom Morris
Sports Writer

K-State athletic director Larry Travis ended weeks of speculation Monday, and withdrew his name from consideration for the athletic director's position at Virginia Tech University in Blacksburg, Va.

With three years left on his contract at K-State, Travis said Virginia Tech's proposal was "quite a bit more" than what K-State could offer financially. But his final decision was based on support from Wildcat athletes.

"When it came down to it, our student athletes (helped me make the decision)," Travis said. "They were great about coming by and letting me know they wanted me to be here. That makes you feel good."

Virginia Tech officials were expected to announce that Marshall University athletic director Dave Braine would become the new Virginia Tech AD at a press conference Monday, but postponed the decision until today.

Blacksburg area newspapers reported Monday that Travis told Virginia Tech president William Lavery of his decision at midnight Sunday. Lavery has announced his pending resignation, which helped form Travis' decision.

"That had something to do with it, not knowing who was going to be the president," Travis said.

William Wallace, director of public affairs at Virginia Tech, said Travis had not officially been offered the job. Raymond Smoot, Virginia Tech's interim athletic director and head of the 16-member athletic director search committee, said Travis and Braine were the only two people considered for the job.

It was reported that Terry Don Phillips, Southwestern Louisiana University's athletic director, was reconsidering Virginia Tech's offer after removing his name for consideration two weeks ago.

Travis visited Blacksburg Nov. 10 and 11, where both the basketball and football programs at Tech are currently on NCAA probation.

Tech's basketball team is prohibited for the next two seasons to participate in postseason play, while the football team has been denied 10 scholarships for each of the next two seasons.

According to published reports, the university's president, William Lavery, is resigning because of a public perception that he had lost control of the athletic program.

Raymond Smoot, who is employed as Virginia Tech's interim athletic director, took over for Dutch Baughman in January. Baughman spent just six months at the school before resigning because of an apparent disapproval of administration launching an investigation of the basketball program without his knowledge.

Travis also cited the "quality of life in Manhattan," the fact that his son Scott has six months left before graduating from Manhattan High School, and the football team's progress as reasons why he chose to stay.

"I think we're close to getting our (football) program turned around where we want it to be, and when I thought about it, I thought it would be best for me and my family to stay here," said Travis, who made two trips to Blacksburg to interview for the position.

Support from K-State president Jon Wefald also assisted Travis in making his final decision.

"I'm convinced that (Wefald is) going to support us as other presidents support their programs around the (Big Eight Conference)," Travis said.

Travis, in his third year at K-State, was considered a candidate for the athletic director's position last year at the University of Florida in Gainesville. He is a Florida alumnus.

Before coming to K-State, Travis served as an assistant athletic director at Georgia Tech from 1980-85.

'Cat volleyball squad finishes with losses

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

It was a long weekend for the Wildcat volleyball team as they dropped two Big Eight Conference matches in Ahearn Field House after a 10-day layoff.

Heading into Friday's match with the University of Missouri, the 'Cats held a 17-8 overall record and a 5-5 conference mark. After hosting the Tigers and the University of Oklahoma, the 'Cats dropped to 17-10 and 5-7.

The Wildcats were beaten by Missouri in a close five-game match by scores of 15-6, 15-8, 13-15, 5-15, and 14-16. The Sooners needed only three games to notch their victory, outscoring K-State, 15-9, 15-6, 15-12.

K-State had all but won the Missouri match. After an hour of play the Wildcats were leading 2-0 in the match and were ahead in the third game, 10-1. Missouri then scored six unanswered points to get back in the game, tied the score at 13-13 and went on to win its first game, 15-13.

With momentum on its side, MU then turned a 4-4 deadlock in the fourth game to a 14-4 advantage over K-State by scoring 10 unanswered points. The Tigers won the game 15-5 to tie the match at two games apiece.

In the fifth and deciding game, the 'Cats let the Tigers jump out to an early 8-3 lead and never caught up, losing a close 14-16 decision. The entire match lasted two hours.

"It doesn't get much closer than this," said Wildcat head coach Scott Nelson.

"For the first two games and part way into the third game, I thought we controlled the tempo of the whole match, but then as the match wore on we went into their rhythm and they started throwing the ball out of the middle and scoring and that kind of slowed down our offense."

Nelson detailed a plan of what his team could have done to preserve its lead.

"If you're ahead two games to none and the other team wins, you're still ahead two to one, all you need to do is challenge — especially in the fourth game — and as the game gets closer and closer the pressure mounts on your opponent," Nelson said. "We didn't challenge them until (late in the game)."

The Oklahoma match saw the Sooners jump out to leads of 10-2 and 9-1 in the first and second games respectively, then come from behind in the third game to win the match in just under an hour.

K-State had a chance to force a fourth game in the match. Leading 9-5 in the third game, the 'Cats allowed OU to score eight unanswered points to take a 13-9 lead, and eventually win, 15-12.

"I'm really disappointed in our whole approach, attitude-wise, these last two matches," Nelson said. "I just don't think we're going out after our opponents and playing very hard. I don't see us having a very good intensity level."

"For us to be successful we've got to be very intense and technically solid in our strengths," he added.

The Wildcats will face either the University of Kansas or the University of Colorado on Friday in the first round of the Big Eight Conference Championships in Salina.

Soccer team takes second in own event

By The Collegian Staff

The men's soccer team from Iowa State University defeated K-State 2-1 Sunday in Kansas City, Mo., to capture the first place trophy in the finals of the Ninth Annual Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament.

K-State accepted the second place trophy, while third place went to the University of Kansas men's team. The permanent tournament plaque hangs in the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The tournament is named after Edward E. Chartrand, a former Leawood, Kan., resident, who played for the K-State soccer team. He died in May 1979 at the age of 22. The tour-namment is hosted annually by the K-State soccer team.

"More or less, the tournament is like the championship of the season," said Dave Weitz, senior in interior architecture and soccer club president.

"Every team that we have played this season is here. The tournament is well run for the ninth year in a row. Every game has run on time and we have nice facilities," he said.

Teams competing in this year's tournament were K-State, Kansas, the University of Northern Iowa, the University of Nebraska-Omaha, The Wichita State University, Iowa State, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln and Oklahoma State University.

Going into the tournament, K-

State had a season record of 10-7-1.

During the first round of games held Saturday at the Kenneth Road Recreational Facility in south Kansas City, K-State defeated Nebraska-Omaha, 1-0, then beat Northern Iowa, 1-0. KU ended K-State's winning streak by defeating the 'Cats, 2-0.

"So far (the tournament) has been great," said Ian Anderson, coach of the K-State soccer club. "The organization and the level of competition is great."

In Sunday's semifinal games, Iowa State downed Kansas, 2-1 and the Wildcats knocked off The Wichita State by the same score.

Cause of crash questioned

Testimony shows contradictions

By The Associated Press

ROMULUS, Mich. — Wing flaps on a Northwest Airlines plane that crashed, killing 156 people, were in the proper takeoff position, but the jet took longer to get off the ground than expected, a witness testified Monday as hearings into the crash opened.

A federal investigator, however, said evidence compiled in the nation's second-deadliest air disaster indicates the flaps were not extended in preparation for takeoff.

The conflicting testimony came on the first day of hearings by the National Transportation Safety Board into the Aug. 16 crash of Flight 255. The only survivor was 4-year-old Cecilia Cichan, whose parents and brother were among those killed.

The hearing is scheduled to continue through the week, but the NTSB isn't expected to issue a report for months.

Douglas Allington, a first officer with Northwest now based in Memphis, Tenn., testified that he thought the doomed airplane could have become airborne if it had not clipped a light pole in a rental-car parking lot.

"I would have expected them to be

Tragedy averted Sunday by pilot

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — An America West jet with 34 passengers on board made a safe landing in Las Vegas after its pilot had to manually lower the landing gear, McCarran International Airport officials said.

Vicki Donaldson, assistant airport director, said Flight 42 from Phoenix, Ariz., touched down at 8:58 p.m. Sunday without incident.

She said the pilot discovered the landing gear problem shortly before the scheduled landing. The pilot manually lowered the landing gear, then flew past the airport tower for a visual inspection, she said.

The plane was cleared to land after tower personnel radioed the gear was in place.

airborne before they were," Allington said. "My personal feeling is that the aircraft would have been able to continue to fly without impact on the light pole."

Other witnesses have told investigators the plane appeared to wobble to the left and right before its wings flattened out to a level position just after it lifted off from runway 3 Center at Detroit Metropolitan Airport.

The plane hit the light pole, veered to the left, hit a building and slammed upside down onto Middlebelt Road just outside the airport property.

Allington said he was in the cockpit of an airplane parked on a taxiway perpendicular to runway 3 Center, watching Flight 255 from the time it began its acceleration to the time it disappeared in flames behind the building.

"The flaps and slats were extended," Allington testified.

He said he could not estimate how far the MD-80's flaps were extended, but he saw light between the wings and the flaps, indicating they were extended.

Earlier Monday, NTSB Chief Investigator John Drake testified that the airplane's flight data recorder and other evidence, including the reconstruction of the damaged wing flap areas, showed that the flaps were not extended.

Drake also said a review of the cockpit voice recorder "revealed that the captain did not call for the taxi checklist before or during the taxiing of the airplane from the assigned gate to runway 3C."

Normally, the setting of the flaps are confirmed during the checklist performed as an airplane taxis to its takeoff position.

Arizona's Mecham: Unreported money an 'honest mistake'

By The Associated Press

PHOENIX, Ariz. — Embattled Gov. Evan Mecham formally reported to the state a $350,000 campaign loan Monday and said his failure to itemize it earlier was an "honest mistake."

"Tonight I bring you everything in order to allow you to be the judge and the jury," the governor said in a televised address on station KTVK.

"This isn't a criminal matter. No one to the best of my knowledge has ever been prosecuted under these laws. An honest mistake was made and it has been corrected."

Meanwhile, a state grand jury resumed hearing testimony Monday in its investigation of the loan, whether it was reported to the secretary of state's office and whether any gubernatorial appointments were tied to the loan.

State law requires reporting to the secretary of state all campaign donations or loans of $25 or more.

In his half-hour address, Mecham said he had filed amended personal and campaign financial statements.

On the new statements, he listed a $350,000 loan from Tempe developer Barry Wolfson and the 14 people who signed promissory notes backing the loan.

His previous campaign financial statement listed a lump sum of $465,000 contributed to the campaign by Mecham himself but did not state that $350,000 of it was a loan from Wolfson.

Westmoreland officer resigns after dog shooting controversy

By Lori Lindstrom Staff Writer

At the Westmoreland City Council meeting last Thursday, the town's animal control officer was relieved of his duties following a controversy arising over an Oct. 10 shooting of a family dog within city limits.

About 60 people attended the meeting, some supporting and some opposing the actions of Steve Schilts, maintenance man and former animal control officer of Westmoreland, according to Marianne Gallagher, investigator for the Riley County Humane Society.

"Schilts asked to be relieved of his position — he wasn't fired — and it appeared that he wanted it that way," Gallagher said.

Schilts was allowed to keep his maintenance position, she added, but "the man was never charged for shooting a gun in city limits," she said.

Gallagher said the city attorney was asked why Schilts was not charged for shooting the gun in city limits, but the public was not given an answer. When the city attorney was reminded a child or adult could have been hit, Gallagher said he replied, "Let's not discuss hypothetical situations."

"They ignored my questions," Gallagher said, referring to the issue that Schilts broke the law when he fired the shotgun in city limits. "He did break the law and it upset a lot of people."

As for firing the gun, Schilts answered "it was a .22 (caliber) and all that was dropped" because no criminal court is available in Westmoreland.

Gallagher said citizens also discussed the problems of people who aren't responsible for their pets and the number of dogs running loose.

The idea of getting involved with the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department was mentioned, as was making arrangements to take stray animals to the new animal shelter when it is completed. Gallagher said the Humane Society also talked of providing a tranquilizer gun for animal control in Westmoreland.

Robert Buss, the owner of the dog that was shot, said he thought it was a "good idea to be involved with the animal shelter in Manhattan and having a tranquilizer gun available instead of having to use a lethal weapon."

Ethnic coordinator named Professor known as blues expert

By Julie Key
Collegian Reporter

Harriet Ottenheimer met Cousin Joe in 1966 while she was in New Orleans researching blues singing. After 21 years, they have finished writing his life story.

"Cousin Joe: Blues from New Orleans" was released Nov. 3.

"He (Cousin Joe) got the idea that he would like to work on his life story and wanted me to write it with him," Ottenheimer said.

He started recording narratives for her in the fall of 1966. They kept in touch by phone and letters, and over the years, they built up enough material to write the book, Ottenheimer said. It wasn't until 1980 that she found time to work on the book.

Harriet Ottenheimer, an expert on Afro-American music and culture, has been named interim coordinator of K-State's American Ethnic Studies Program. She has been involved in the development of the program

"The songs don't express an 'oh woe is me' attitude, but rather, 'I'm going to make it in this situation, and I'll look at the humor in it.'"

—Harriet Ottenheimer

since its inception in 1984.

Provost James Coffman said Ottenheimer was named interim coordinator because of her academic credibility and her involvement in the program. Her new duties include planning the budget, updating the program's handbook and coordinating the governing board and faculty.

Ottenheimer, a professor of anthropology, will divide her time between the coordinator position, and teaching and research in anthropology.

Anthropology gave her the background to study blues music, she said. Blues is a part of cultural anthropology.

Ottenheimer's father exposed her to all types of music. She said she particularly liked jazz, boogie-woogie piano music and blues.

"Blues won't die out. It will change. It has changed," Ottenheimer said. She said what was blues of the 1920s and 1930s doesn't sound like what's being played now.

Blues developed out of a situation of extreme frustration, Ottenheimer said. The black people were frustrated because they were not able to live a full life in a country where they were supposed to be able to.

"The songs don't express an 'oh woe is me' attitude, but rather, 'I'm going to make it in this situation, and I'll look at the humor in it,'" Ottenheimer said.

It is a remarkable blend of sadness and humor, she said. "I'm laughing to keep from crying" is a line out of a blues song that expresses that idea.

The Hibachi Hut brings in a few blues musicians to Manhattan each year, Ottenheimer said. This summer, country blues musician John Hammond Jr. performed to a standing room only audience at the establishment.

Ottenheimer also produces programs for elementary school children. She emphasizes the music, games and folklore of the Africans and American Indians.

Schools could do a better job of teaching the varieties of cultures, she said, adding that students should be aware of the similarities and differences of all groups.

"It is crucial for everyone to be aware of ethnic heritage," Ottenheimer said. "We all have different backgrounds, but we are all Americans."

Hayden denies rumor concerning Dole replacement

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden, a strong supporter for Sen. Bob Dole's bid for the presidency, said he has not thought about who he would appoint to the Kansas Senate seat if Dole resigns.

Hayden could name Dole's replacement if the Kansas senator resigns — either after winning the Republican nomination or after being elected U.S. president. Dole announced his candidacy for president at his hometown of Russell last week.

Speculation that Hayden had met Dole recently in Washington, D.C., to discuss naming U.S. Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Dodge City, to take Dole's place in the Senate is untrue, the governor said.

Hayden said he did meet with Dole in Washington, but the topic of Dole's possible replacement or Roberts did not come up during the conversation.

Hayden said he will not consider any replacement for Dole until after he gets the nomination.

"There's no end of the list of people who would be interested," Hayden said, adding that he has no personal desire to fill the Senate seat should it become vacant.

Hayden said he has already contributed $1,000 to Dole's campaign, the maximum he can donate under the law.

In other matters, Hayden said he would throw open his campaign books to let people see who has made campaign contributions to him while he has served in the governor's office.

Under the current law, his campaign contributions would not be subject to public scrutiny until 10 days before the next primary in August, 1990.

The Kansas Republican Party has been critical recently of former Democratic Gov. John Carlin for the campaign contributions he received during his eight years in office.

Public officials should be able to receive campaign contributions even though they have not been declared as candidates, Hayden said. Frequently, elected officials have expenses related to their positions that cannot be covered by taxpayers, the governor added, such as contributions to a United Way auction.

"Over the course of a year, that can amount to $1,000," he said, "and over the course of a term, $10,000."

Hayden stated candidates and office holders should not be able to pocket campaign contributions, however, which is currently allowed under state law.

"I don't think it should be used for personal use," he said. He also said the Legislature should define more narrowly what expenses can be covered by the campaign contributions received.

'How-to-survive' tapes ready for students

By The Collegian Staff

Tips on how to survive finals, hangovers and stress are on tapes available to students by dialing 532-6907. "DIAL" is a phone-in system designed to provide current information and referral on more than 200 general topics of interest.

Anyone interested in using the service can find a list of the tapes available on Page 26 in the 1987-88 campus directory, said Kenyon Madden, media assistant for Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

Madden said the program is funded by the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

The majority of the tapes are housed in the University Enhancement and Resource Network located in the basement of Holton Hall. The crisis center in University for Man houses the recordings on mental health issues, Madden said.

Debbie Paap, co-director of U-LearnN, said the service was updated this summer and several tapes were added to the list.

"Tapes informing people about Kansas drinking laws, date rape and AIDS have been added because of the increased interest in these topics," she said.

Paap said the recordings last three to eight minutes, and local referral for more information is provided at the end of each tape.

"The service is easy to use and is a good starting point for information," Paap said. "Also a person calling for information concerning a sensitive topic can remain anonymous."

Paap said U-LearnN is open 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. People wanting information after 5 p.m. can call 532-6972, the crisis center "DIAL After Hours" number.

His Holiness Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, Founder of the Transcendental Meditation Program

Dear Student,

There's something you can do for a short time each day that will improve every aspect of your life—your grades, your future career, your relationships, everything—all at the same time. What's more, it's easy to do. Over 1,000,000 students have experienced the benefits. And you can too.

You'll learn about it soon at a special free lecture on the Transcendental Meditation technique, and regardless of what you've already heard about TM, this entertaining talk will surprise and enlighten you. More than that, it may well change your life.

My name is Hugh Brennan. I'm president of the student government at Maharishi International University, where students, faculty, and staff all practice the TM technique. I want to tell you three things about the upcoming lecture:

1. At the lecture, you'll learn how the simple, natural TM technique, which is practiced for 15-20 minutes twice a day, brings profound benefits to mind and body, and how these benefits automatically improve one's social behavior, school and job performance, and much more.

"Experiencing the unified field through the TM technique really gives me more support of nature. As soon as I began TM, everything became easier, and my grade-point average went up a whole point!"
—Sam Boothby
Ph.D. candidate
Education
Harvard University

Scientific Research

2. You'll also learn about the vast amount of scientific research that's been done on TM (more than 350 studies worldwide over the past 15 years).

If you really want to know how to improve your grades, your career, and your life, there's an upcoming lecture you shouldn't miss.

And you'll learn that a lot of the research findings are directly relevant to your personal and academic development as a student. Here, for example, is a partial list of the research results in the field of education:

- increased intelligence
- improved comprehension, concentration, and memory
- increased learning ability
- increased speed in solving problems
- increased creativity
- broader comprehension and ability to focus attention
- improved academic performance
- reduced stress and anxiety
- decreased use of drugs, alcohol, and cigarettes
- increased happiness
- improved relationships between students and teachers
- improved mind-body coordination
- improved athletic performance

Now, I'm sure you'd like to have some of those qualities growing in your life. Well you can. And the beautiful thing is that these qualities grow naturally, simply as a result of practicing the TM technique.

World Peace

3. Finally, if you are concerned not just with your own future, but also the future of our nation and the world, there's even more reason to attend the lecture.

This is because the TM technique doesn't just help the individual. The coherence generated when people practice TM extends to society as a whole. Research has shown that when as little as the square root of one percent of a population practices the TM program and its advanced aspects, the entire population becomes more orderly, peaceful, and progressive.

"TM is the best antidote to stress I know of. When individuals are free of stress, they behave more harmoniously. I'm convinced that if people practiced TM, world peace would be a reality."
—Kurleigh D. King
Director, Institute for World Leadership
Former Director-General, Caribbean Community and Common Market

This "Super Radiance Effect" has been demonstrated in communities, cities—even entire nations. This brings great hope for the future, because it means that the age-old problems of world peace may at last have a solution.

It Works!

If you're wondering how one simple technique can bring so many benefits to mind, body, behavior, and even the world as a whole, I urge you to attend the free lecture. The explanation you'll hear is at once simple, scientific, and profound.

"TM is the single most important part of being a peak performer. It gives you the ability to excel in an environment of stress, to make rapid decisions based on rapid changes, and to do so functioning very well."
—Christopher Hegarty, President
Hegarty and Associates
San Francisco, CA

You'll hear, for example, about the unified field of all the laws of nature as described by modern physics and by ancient Vedic science. And about how the TM technique lets you experience the unified field within your own consciousness. And about how that experience, gained regularly, brings you the support of all the laws of nature.

"When you practice TM, you can experience the full range of education—not just gaining classroom knowledge, but developing the knower, and that's yourself!"
—Karen Blasdel
Ph.D. candidate
Neuroscience
Maharishi International University

The main thing, however, is that TM works. I know from my own experience. I've been practicing the technique for 6 years, and its made me more relaxed, yet more dynamic and productive. As a result, I'm enjoying greater success—both in and out of the classroom!

Of course, whether you start the TM technique or not is up to you. But doesn't it make sense to at least attend the lecture? If even ten percent of what I've said about TM proves to be true, think what it could mean for your achievement and happiness for the rest of your life.

Free Lecture

The date and time of the lecture is given below. I hope you'll be there, and don't hesitate to bring your friends; you'll be doing a great thing for them as well!

Wishing you success in all that you do,

S. Hugh Brennan
